immediately for the damage that dangerous washing compounds do. It's there, and it's going on all the time, but you won't see its effects, probably, for several months. It wouldn't do, you know, to have them too dangerous.

The best way is to take no risk. You needn't worry about damage to your clothes, if you keep to the original washing compound—Pearline; first made and fully proved. What can you gain by using the imitations of it? Prize packages, cheaper prices, or whatever may be urged for them, wouldn't pay you for one ruined garment.

Beware

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 346 JAMES PYLE, New York.

FARM NOTES.

(From the Farm, Field and Stockman.)

Potatoes ought to be out of the ground.

The consumption of mutton is largely on the increase.

Oil the harness the first day it rains too hard to plow or husk corn.

Good stock deserves good care, and good care deserves good stock.

A poor cow is a dead weight which will drag a man to the bottom of the slough of despond.

Better buy your milk and butter of the neighbors than to keep a cow that will not pay her keeping.

Steady, continuous growth is what tells nowadays. "Storing" periods play the mischief with profits.

The poor cow is not to blame for being poor; she is so by birth and breeding and can't help herself.

Educate the butter-maker and slaughter the poor cow, if you expect to make any money out of dairying.

Short pasture makes a short yield of milk unless supplemented with a grain ration and plenty of fodder corn.

It may seem a little out of season for weeding, but it is just the season of year for weeding the poor cows out of a dairy herd.

Do unto your cows as you would have them do unto you. If you are stingy with feed they will be stingy with milk.

There is no grain equal to oats for feeding to calves, and mixed with ground corn there is no better food for milch cows.

There is hope for poor butter-makers, as they can be educated; but for poor cows there is none, as they cannot be made over.

We are undecided as to which is the heavier tax on the farmer—bad roads or the credit system. Get rid of both as soon as possible.

If growing stock is carried through the winter only to come out next spring weighing less than now, wintering will be a profitless operation.

As well expect to reach the top of a flight of stairs by climbing up two steps and falling down three as to expect to make any profit on a poor cow.

There is no profit in keeping cattle and half starving them. Profit lies altogether in growth; hence the greater the growth the greater the profit.

Prof. W. A. Henry has shown by experiment that it costs $2.61 to produce 100 pounds of gain with lambs, and $3.03 to secure the same gain with pigs of about the same age.

The farmer who has the cows come in this fall will receive a just reward for his business foresight by getting a high price for butter this winter—providing the butter is well made.

Professor Roberts, of Cornell University, finds by repeated experiments that sheep are the most valuable of domestic animals in keeping up the producing capacity of a farm.

An experience of over twenty years in fattening sheep convinces Prof. Roberts that it pays to have a regular system, to be followed as nearly as possible, in both feeding and marketing sheep.

"The melancholy days have come" for the cow whose master thinks it is all right for her to sleep out-of-doors on cold frosty nights, and to rustle around in the cold fall rains in search of food.

The axiom "A penny saved is worth two earned" is practically illustrated by feeding unthreshed oats to cows and calves. Try it once, and you will never waste time, money and labor in threshing oats.

Of course, after milking your cows all summer you know what each can do, and whether you are milking her at a profit or a loss, so you will have no trouble in telling which ones to sell to the butcher.

It costs the farmer much more to get his products from the farm to the railway station than from the station to market. Good roads reduce the cost of getting from the farm to the railway. Build good roads.

If just enough food is used to keep the calves "even," not losing, not gaining, that food is practically wasted, for it brings in no return. After the "food of support," give some to push ahead.

There are three jobs that should be pushed every hour of daylight these fall days—plowing, corn husking and getting out manure. One or the other can be done every day unless it rains hard.

I hate to see a man's arm drop down as if he was shot, before the clock's fairly struck, just as if he'd never a bit o' pride and delight in 's works. The very grindstone 'ull go on turning a bit after you loose it.—Adam Bede.

One of the quickest ways of increasing the value of a farm is to build a good road to it. Besides adding to the worth of the farm you increase the profits of farming by reducing the cost of transportation of products to market.

Those who have decided to give their stock good feed and good care this winter should look the stock over now, and decide which will not be likely to pay for them. Almost every farm has some "scallwags" on it that ought to be culled out.

You can save money with Dr. Pierce's medicines, if you get the genuine. Suppose they're not the lowest in price—what does that matter? The point that's important is this:—they're the cheapest medicines you can buy at any price, for, with them, you pay only for the good you get. If they ever fail to benefit or cure, you have your money back. Can you ask more?

But, there's only one way to get these genuine guaranteed medicines. To guard against fraud and imposition, they're sold only through druggists regularly authorized as agents, and always at these long-established prices:

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery (for the liver, blood and lungs), $1.00.
Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription (for woman's weaknesses and ailments), $1.00.
Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets (for the liver, stomach and bowels), 25 cents.
Beware of fraudulent imitations and dilutions offered at lower prices than the above.

Of the Cincinnati M. E. Conference, in a voluntary testimonial accompanying a letter says: "We have for years used Hood's Sarsaparilla in our family of five, and find it fully equal to all that is claimed for it. Some people are greatly prejudiced against patent medicines, but I think a patent article is better than one unworthy a patent. How the patent can hurt a medicine and not a machine is a mystery of mystery to me." SYLVANUS LANE, Pastor M. E. church, Groesbeck, Hamilton County, Ohio.

At a fair estimate, the Prohibition vote in the recent Presidential election numbered 325,000, against 249,945 in 1888—an encouraging gain.

"Protestant Schools for Protestant Children," should be the motto of those who do not wish to have their children educated in the mummeries and deceptions of the papacy.

The vote of Illinois for Governor was less than that for President; showing that the political secret orders did not vote for the only ticket in the field (Prohibition) that fairly and squarely supported the little red-school-house.

"President Johnson seems to think, judging from a recent brilliant article, that a further Revelation and a New-er Testament are possibilities."—New York Christian (Baptist) Enquirer. This is just what the Mormons have claimed ever since they organized; they have, also, the new revelation and the New-er Testament—The Book of Mormon.

In pursuance of a resolution of Congress, seven Senators were appointed a committee to investigate and report to the Senate "the facts in relation to the employment for private purposes of armed bodies of men or detectives in connection with differences between workingmen and their employers," etc. During the past week two of the committee, Senators Peffer and Gallinger, have been inquiring into the relation of the Pinkertons to the Homestead strike-riots. The testimony taken will be sifted by Congress at a later date.

At the council of Roman Catholic archbishops, last week, Archbishop Katzer, of Milwaukee, defined the secret societies which the Roman church opposes. First of these is Freemasonry; then the Knights of Pythias. An exception was made in favor of Odd-fellowship, because that order admits Catholics. Summed up in a brief sentence, the Romish church opposes no secret society whose members are good Catholics and go regularly to confession. All others are tabooed. It is not a question of secrecy at all with the archbishops, for they countenance a number of secret societies among their members; they denounce only those whose membership they cannot control.

The proposition of our government to induce all passenger steamers running between foreign countries and the United States not to bring here any but cabin passengers during next year, would have a most desirable effect, if stringently adopted. It would cause a great decrease in undesirable immigration, largely prevent the importation of cholera and other dangerous epidemics, give firmness to all classes of wages, since European pauper labor could no longer be brought into competition with American skill and industry. The steamship companies are said to be in favor of this movement, with an important modification.

The article which we print elsewhere, from the Louisville, Ky., Commercial, needs no apology, as it is a clear indictment of the secret labor unions for exercising political influence in the recent national election. The history of France is a record of the baleful power of secrecy as a factor in government affairs; and any clique of politicians, or clan of oath-bound conspirators, that resorts to these underhanded methods of securing success, is an enemy to the free republican institutions of our country. If the Republican party, as alleged, was defeated by this hidden influence, we have no surety that the same influence may not attempt to destroy any other party to which it shall oppose itself. The worst of it is, that the secret societies are so selfish in their motives and proceedings that they entirely ignore the rights and interests of all other men; and for this reason alone they deserve to be crushed out by every fair and honorable means.

THE CHURCH THE BULWARK OF THE LODGE.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE NEBRASKA STATE CONVENTION, BY JOS. W. MORTON, D. D., NORTH LOUP, NEBRASKA.

(Concluded.)

But what has this to do with secret societies? Much every way. To the best of my knowledge and belief, strikers, boycotters and resisters of sheriffs and other peace officers, are nearly all members of secret orders. Non-union men scarce ever strike, and rarely, if ever, resist the law. But we are told that the leaders of these societies discountenance any resort to violence. So they say: But was any man ever expelled from his society for using violence in a strike? I do not think such a thing ever happened. On the contrary, these societies appropriate money for the defense of their members when they are tried for such offences. They are all accessories, both before and after the fact, if they are not really aiders and abettors.

I presume there are not less than one million voters in the United States, who are more or less in sympathy with that Homestead riot; who, if the question were put to them: "Was the killing of the Pinkerton men murder?" would, if strictly candid, unhesitatingly answer: "No; they had no business to be there, and they were served right." And all these are members of secret orders. On the contrary, I do not know a single man, not a member of any secret society, who has any sympathy with that riot.

Brethren, do you want to have fellowship with treason? Do you wish to have your children grow up under such influences as these? If you do, may God forgive and pity you!

4. Secret societies, as far as I know, are all religious organizations; and their religion is not that of the Bible. This is intended as a general remark. Possibly there may be a few of these societies that hold, in a loose way, to the Christian religion; but this is not true of the most of them. According to the Christian religion, there is but one way of salvation, and that is through faith in Christ. Most secret societies, however, offer salvation to their members without Christ. True, they are all willing that their members should believe in and practice any other religion, claiming to be tolerant of all religions; but they regard their own religious system as all-sufficient. How often we hear Freemasons say that Masonry is as good a religion as any other, if it is only well lived up to! This is not an occasional remark, made by some ignorant person, but it is the deep-seated conviction of a large proportion of the members of that fraternity.

Now, to begin with, does any human being need more than one religion? Reason teaches that, if one has the true religion, the possession of another and a different one would only hamper him and distract his mind. We do read of some one who was in the habit of praying alternately to the Lord and to the devil, and who, when he was asked to give his reason for so doing, replied that it was uncertain into whose hands he might fall, and therefore he proposed to make himself "solid" with both sides of the house. This has a certain air of plausibility; and perhaps we ought not too judge too severely him who, in the fear that Christ may fail him at last and he may miss the Christian's heaven, thinks it wise to secure a title to a mansion in some other heaven; as, for instance, in "the Grand Lodge above;" but you, my brethren, who are not afraid to trust in Christ, believing him to be abundantly able to save to the uttermost all that come to God by him; you certainly have no need of any other religion.

The next question is: Can a man practice two different religions at the same time? To which the Master himself has given us an emphatic negative answer: "No man can serve two masters." If any man undertakes to be, at the same time, both a Christian and a Freemason, one of two things will certainly happen: Either he will be a very indifferent Christian, or he will neglect his Masonic obligations.

As some are not aware, and as many who ought to know better, affect not to believe that secret societies are religious, it may be well, in a few words, to state the well-known facts.

Freemasonry, in its first seven degrees, comprising those of the Blue and Red lodge, is a mixture of a lower order of natural religion and Baalism, or sun-worship. In its middle degrees it passes into a form of medieval Romanism, borrowing its rights and its leading ideas from the Crusaders; winding up, in its last degree, recently introduced into this country under the name of "The Nobles of the Mystic Shrine," with a feeble imitation of Mohammedanism.

Odd-fellowship is simply natural religion, or pure theism, recognizing a God, but ignoring both Christ and the Bible. Most other secret societies are modeled, in their religious features, either upon Masonry or Odd-fellowship; though there may be a few of them, as the Grand Army of the Republic, that have in their prayers a feeble recognition of Christ. They all have, I think without exception, chaplains, rituals, or prescribed religious services, some of them more and others less elaborate. They all have, I believe, prayer, singing and a burial service; and some of them profess to conduct their worthy and consistent members to final happiness, in some kind of a heaven; the name given to this among the Masons being "The Grand Lodge above."

In addition to these simple religious rites, it is said by those who profess to know whereof they affirm, that the Masons sometimes administer a rite of so-called baptism, and that in one of the degrees the candidate is made to drink wine out of a human skull, in connection with one of the most horrible imprecations ever uttered by human lips. This I believe, as I believe ten thousand other things, on trustworthy evidence. Other rites have been revealed by those who have renounced these hidden works of darkness; some of them foolish, others blasphemous, and all of them impious and sacrilegious. The prayers offered in the secret lodges are almost always, even in the temperance secret organizations, offered without any allusion to Christ or his atonement. In some of them, this "Name above every name" is positively excluded, both from the prayers and the Scripture readings. My Christian brother, what do you think of this? Can you fellowship such things? If you become a member of a secret lodge, you become associated with infidels and scoffers; and they are just as worthy members, in the eye of the lodge, as you are. Is this seeking the blessedness of "the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful?" You profess to walk daily with God and his Christ; when you come to the door of the lodge, from which Christ is excluded by law, you are presumably walking with Christ; and you must perforce say to him: "My dear Redeemer, excuse me for two or three hours. I am going into this lodge-room, to sit among a company of my brethren, some of whom are no friends of yours; and I have solemnly promised them not to take you with me when I visit them. So please stay here till I come back;" and I seem to hear the blessed Master say: "My dear child and brother, let me enter with you into your lodge. I love to hold companionship with my brethren; and I am willing to go with you, even to prison and to death; surely this place cannot be so bad as the gloomy dungeon; please let me go with you." But you answer: "Not now, my Lord and Master; some of these brethren of mine are profane, and might blaspheme you to your face. Indeed, your continual presence there would soon break up the lodge." This, my Christian brother, if you are a daily, living Christian, is precisely what you say to our blessed Master, though you may not be conscious of it, every time you enter a lodge of Freemasons or Odd-fellows, or any other lodge that excludes the name of Christ from its prayers or Scripture readings.

What do you think of that young man who, in offering himself to a virtuous young woman, should say: "I wish to become your husband; but you must understand that I shall keep one or more mistresses, with whom you will have to share my time and affections?" You are horrified at the thought. "No decent man," you say, "would dare propose such a thing." But this is precisely what the secret-society man does, every time he offers himself for membership in the church without renouncing his lodge. He proposes to worship God in the church, "in spirit and in truth," and to practice a false religion in the lodge. What is this but spiritual harlotry?

A few weeks ago, I saw the card of a man who calls himself a minister of the Gospel, and is the pastor of a so-called "Evangelical church." This man had caused to be printed, under his name, "The Rev. So-and-so," a list of the secret societies of which he is a member, to the number of five or six; beginning with "The Ancient Order of Free and Accepted Masons," and ending with "Nobles of the Mystic Shrine." What a spiritual harem this is for a minister of the Gospel to maintain! I was told that no conversions ever take place under his ministry, and I do not wonder at it.

There are two objections that are likely to be offered to what I have said, to which I wish to give special attention:

1. I seem to hear some one say: "You have no right to class all secret societies together. Some of them may be very evil, but others are perfectly innocent. For instance, I belong to the Grand Army of the Republic; what harm can there be in that? It is unfair to treat them all alike."

I thank you, friend, for mentioning the Grand Army. We will accept it as the type of all that is least wicked in secret societies. I beg to remind you, however, that in determining the evil that belongs to any institution, there are two questions to be considered: First, What is the evil inherent in itself? and secondly, What evil does it work in the community? These questions are both of prime importance, and are to be discussed separately; but the second of them is often entirely ignored. A thing may be almost unobjectionable in itself, and yet may do great harm. When two things are compared, one may have far less evil in itself, and yet may work immensely more mischief in the community than the other. Let us offer a few illustrations:

The "gilded saloon," located in the residence part of a city, is much more decently conducted than the low-down "groggery" of the slums; but every temperance reformer knows that the former is vastly more hurtful to the cause of sobriety and religion than the latter. You all know the reasons. Dr. Rainsford's "church saloon," though it might be in itself the least evil of all, would be the worst of all in its consequences.

The moral, upright man, who as a citizen is above reproach, but who teaches that salvation is attainable by works, who scoffs at the atonement of Christ, and ridicules the Bible, will send more souls to hell than could a hundred foul-mouthed blasphemers; not because he is worse than they, but rather because he is not so bad as they. The less evil a man is, other things being equal, the more harm he can do to other men. Satan always gets in his most effective work when he is arrayed as "an angel of light."

Now as to the Grand Army: I have not much to say against it, as in itself considered. Many of my best friends are members of it, and I know that they do not wish to harm anybody. There is but one objection that I care now to offer to it, as an organization, and that is, that it is a secret society. I have other objections to it, but they do not belong to this discussion. But what about the influence of the Grand Army, and all the other so-called "minor orders?" What is their influence upon society at large, and especially upon the church? It is admitted, I think, by all, and if it is denied, it can easily be proved, that there is a common bond of sympathy running through all the secret orders; and the Grand Army is no exception to this rule. It was conceived and brought forth by Masons; it is and always has been largely officered by Masons; a large proportion of its members are Masons and Odd-fellows; and its other members almost universally give to all the secret orders the sympathy of their silence.

These minor orders have weakened and lowered the testimony of the church against the more wicked secret lodges. They stand, my brother pastor, between you and the Freemason, and you cannot aim a shot at his head without hitting them. But they are so lamb-like and so popular that you do not want to hit them. Thus, they are obstacles in the way of righteous and wholesome discipline.

Whenever and wherever they have been allowed to come into the church, they have set the door wide open, and held it open for Masons, Odd-fellows and all other secret men and women to come in. Let me relate an incident. I know a church, which, some twenty or twenty-five years ago, had not one secret society member on her roll. One of her leading members came to the church meeting and said: "Brethren, as you know, I have a brother who is a drunkard. He has promised me that, if I will go with him and join the 'Temple of Honor,' he will sign the pledge and quit drinking. I ask the privilege of doing this." The request was granted; and I am told that it was not more than a year from that time when that same brother was a member of every secret society in the town; and there were not so many of them then as there are now; for I am informed by a brother who was recently a pastor there, that there are now more than fifty secret lodges in that town of about ten thousand inhabitants; one for every two hundred people, of all sexes and ages! At the same time, you can count the churches of that city on the fingers of your two hands. I have never met a member of any secret order that had anything like an outspoken, earnest testimony to give against any other secret society; and no church that has any considerable number of Grand Army men, or Good Templars, in her fellowship will ever, in my opinion, utter any strong protest against Masonry or any other secret evil.

2. Referring to the first sentences of this address, I am reminded of the oft-repeated assertion: "If Masonry and other secret orders were the evil thing you say they are, surely so many good people would not join them."

The first thing I have to do, in answering this objection, is to admit that there are good people in most, if not all, of these societies. If there were not, they would soon perish; but I invite your candid attention to the following points:

(1) Many good men, both ministers and laymen, have joined these societies without investigating either their principles or their fruits. They have various reasons for taking this step. Some join them, because they have dear and honored friends who are members; others, because they are fond of society, and the lodge is a convenient club-room; others, because they expect to gain, by this means, more or less advantage in their business, or preferment in the political world. It is said that some Methodist ministers have joined the Masons, because the presiding elder was a Mason, and it was an understood thing that Masonic preachers, other things being equal, would stand the best chance of receiving desirable appointments. I have no personal knowledge of this; but Methodist brethren have told me so.

I know of one brother in the ministry who is opposed to secrecy, in general, but has been heard to say, in substance: "We cannot reasonably refuse to our brethren the privilege of joining labor lodges in the cities; for there are many places where this is the only way in which they can obtain employment." Is this so? Have the secret labor unions so completely stamped out the natural rights of their non-union fellow-citizens, that they can debar them from the field of honest toil? Have they obtained a monopoly of the labor market? If so, what more is needed to stamp them as tyrants and enemies of the divinely constituted brotherhood of man?

Some join secret societies because they are so constituted, mentally, that secrecy has a strong fascination for them.

Perhaps there is not one in a hundred of those who are members of secret societies that have ever investigated their principles, and especially their results, in the clear light of Scripture and reason. Besides, in the Masonic, and perhaps in other lodges, the candidate is solemnly assured that there is nothing in the obligation about to be assumed that can conflict with his duty to the church, the state or his family. Every intelligent man knows that this assurance is a falsehood; but the candidate believes it, and he is hoodwinked.

(2) Multitudes of good men, both ministers and laymen, refuse to enter the lodges, believing them to be evil; and many others who were members have left them for the same reason: Therefore, the testimony of good men is at least as strong on the side of the opposition as on the other. If the reverend Simon Simpleton, Chaplain of Hiram Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, is a good man, so was Charles G. Finney; so was Bishop Hamline, whom "God converted from Masonry when he converted him from his other sins;" so were David Bernard, Nathaniel Colver, and a host of other ministers who seceded from Masonry. Besides all this, it is a well-known fact that there are multitudes of ministers of evangelical churches who have a nominal connection with the lodges, but who are heartily sick of them and wish they had never joined them. Yet the most of these have their lips hermetically sealed on the subject, not only by the profane and blasphemous oaths taken at the time of their initiation, but especially by the dread of the bitter scorn and obloquy that would be heaped upon them by their brethren, if they should utter aloud their true sentiments. If a Mason should leave the lodge, and say that Masonry is a humbug, he would be denounced as "a perjured villain." Comparatively few men have the moral courage to face this kind of music.

A few weeks ago, eight thousand soldiers were sent to Homestead, Pennsylvania, for the sole purpose of preventing members of secret societies from destroying property and shedding innocent blood. Still more recently, about the same number of troops were sent to Buffalo, New York, for a similar purpose. These were both cases of incipient rebellion; and at least two other such cases have transpired in other States, within a few months past; and the organized secret mobs thus held in check are apparently just as defiant as ever, seemingly simply waiting for the time when they shall be strong enough for a successful resistance of "the powers that be." Does any sane man doubt that we owe these treasonable mobs to secret societies?

Brethren, members of evangelical churches, what think ye of secret societies? Are you still inclined to favor them? Will you not at least adopt these simple and reasonable rules? Never to join any society, until you have first made yourselves familiar with all its principles, its practices and its plans of work, and compared them with the Word of God. Never to take an oath, or even give a promise, to keep anything secret, before it has been revealed to you. Never to give to any man, or body of men, that implicit faith and undying homage which is due to God in Christ alone. Never to belong to any society that is, in any sense, a rival of the church, or that claims to be as good as, or better than, the church. Always to seek the elevation of the church to higher standards, rather than to do the work of the church through other organizations.

Brethren, let us remember that all true reform should begin in our own hearts, and in the church to which we belong. That man who will not reform himself will make slow work in reforming others; that church that refuses to reform herself, or be reformed, will not only fail in spreading reform principles through the community, but she is already on the high road to apostasy. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me," is as true of churches as of individuals. Let, then, our prayer be that of the Psalmist: "Search me, O Lord, and know my heart; try me and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me; and lead me in the way everlasting."

POLITICAL SECRET SOCIETIES DEFEATED HARRISON.

Now that the smoke of the conflict is clearing away and the rolls are being called and the country is recovering from its surprise, and the dazed Republicans from the shock, investigation as to what caused it all is in order. The result is remarkable enough to invite investigation. President Harrison is a man of admirable personal character and record. He has given the country a firm, efficient, clean and able administration of both its domestic and foreign affairs, and the country is in the enjoyment of unexampled prosperity. Labor is fully employed at good wages, commerce is large and expanding and profitable, and the business condition of the country is sound and healthy.

It is true that there was some criticism of the composition of the convention which renominated President Harrison, but it was mostly mere cavil, for the convention was constituted in about the same way that all conventions are that nominate Presidents for a second term, and it undoubtedly expressed the preponderance of the party will, and at the last the party was thoroughly united in his support.

On the other hand Mr. Cleveland was defeated four years ago by President Harrison, and had done nothing to make himself stronger with the people than he was then. His own State preferred another of its sons to him, and he was nominated by the national convention of his party in spite of that fact, and in spite of the formal protest of the party delegation from his own State.

That he should be elected at all under all the circumstances was hardly to be expected with any confidence; that he should be elected by an extraordinary majority shows that some extraordinary influence was brought into play. The ordinary influences were calculated on. There was the so-called "force bill," which was used as a bugaboo to keep the South solid, but it was calculated in all conservative estimates that the South would remain solid. There was the parochial school question in Illinois and Wisconsin, but it had been settled in Wisconsin; and Chicago, which determined the vote of Illinois, did not care about the school question. The silver question and the Farmers' Alliance did in the West little more than was expected from them. The McKinley bill was expected to turn the farmers toward the Democratic party; but Iowa, one of the most purely agricultural of States, returned to the Republican column with something like its old-time majorities, and a close analysis of the counties and precincts in the country will show, we believe, that in all of them, outside of the South, of which the residents were farmers or people engaged in mercantile and professional pursuits, the advantage was with the Republicans, who made, in many cases, large gains. The great losses, the losses which determined the election, were made in cities and counties and precincts in which there was a large population engaged in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits and in railroading.

It was to these classes, to the men earning wages, the legitimate workingmen of the country, that the Republicans appealed in behalf of the McKinley bill with most confidence, but we believe that analysis will show that it was from these men came the votes that defeated Harrison and reversed the policy of the country, and that they were not governed by their views in regard to the McKinley bill, but by other considerations. An intelligent gentleman and experienced politician, well acquainted with politics in Indiana, has called our attention to the fact that great Democratic gains were made in New Albany in the wards and precincts inhabited by the rolling-mill men and the glass-works men, while the Republicans made gains in other wards and precincts; that in the purely agricultural counties in the State the Republicans gained, while they lost in the counties where manufacturing and railroad interests are strongest; that in the gas belt, where many new factories have started and where they expected to gain five or six thousand, and where the Democrats allowed that they would gain 3,000, they gained barely 1,000. In Connecticut the Republicans gained in the farming towns and lost in the manufacturing villages. Can anybody believe that the great falling off of the Republican majority in Pennsylvania was due to any reaction against the McKinley bill? Pennsylvania has been the advocate of protection, and her people have favored it since the State was admitted to the Union. Ohio voted only a year ago for McKinley by a large majority. Does anybody believe there has been such a change of opinion about his bill as the vote of Tuesday indicates? There is no exception to the rule that the Republicans lost wherever there was a manufacturing population—and labor unions.

The Homestead strike was inaugurated on the theory that this was a Presidential year, and that party pressure would be brought to bear on the Carnegie company to make it yield to the demands of the Amalgamated Association.

In an interview published during the campaign, a prominent local labor leader said, in substance, that Harrison's Administration ought to put those Homestead men back to work, and pay them the wages they demanded; that the Administration had the power to do it, and the right to do it, and if it did not that there would be a political revolution that would surprise it. A member of the Amalgamated Association said after that, in an interview in a local paper, in substance, that if the strike at Homestead were not a success the workingmen would form free-trade clubs. Four weeks ago an agent of the Amalgamated Association came to New Albany and held a meeting in the Democratic club room, to which workmen of both parties were invited. Every effort was made by Republicans to learn what was done at that meeting, but they failed. It was noticed about that time that the iron and glass workers ceased to attend Republican meetings.

A merchant tailor of this city stated that his foreman, who had been an active-talking Republican up to a week before the election, suddenly stopped talking, and the day before election said he was going to vote for Cleveland. One of his employes told a prominent lumberman of this city a few days before the election that the report that Frick and Pinkerton had subscribed to the Republican campaign funds had made the labor unions mad and that they were organized against the Republican party.

There are in all the unions a few leading men who are ready and forcible talkers, and when they go around and address secret meetings of the unions and appeal to their passions and prejudices when there is no one to answer them, they have an easy task in securing a vote that binds every member of the lodge or chapter or whatever it may be.

The fact that Whitelaw Reid, who had just compromised a difficulty of long standing with the typographical union, was a candidate on the Republican ticket, and that Mr. Chauncey Depew, who was president of a railroad company which had just defeated a strike of switchmen, was one of the most approved orators of the Republican party, helped the labor unions in solidifying their ranks against Harrison. Every Democratic speaker who addressed labor audiences dwelt on these facts. It is a noticeable fact that there was not a single labor union paper in the United States that advocated Harrison.

Under all the circumstances it is fair to conclude that the labor unions practically declared a boycott against the Republican ticket, and that the country has to take account of a new secret oath-bound political party, which regards nothing but the narrow interests and prejudices of a class. If this is true the labor unions have "bit off their nose to spite their face." If protection is not for the interest of the workingmen of the country it is not of enough interest to other people to bother about; and if they care so little about it as to strike it down whenever they get into a quarrel over wages or hours, its most ardent supporters will soon be ready to let it go.—*Louisville (Ky.) NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The recent election.—The Prohibition party and Rome.—Our New England Convention.—The Christian Workers.—The Boys' Brigade.

The recent Presidential election will be noted in history as the first one in which women were allowed to vote for the chief executive. If the privilege had only been general instead of being confined to a limited area, there might have been a marked change in the returns. It is certainly a coincidence that Wyoming went Republican when States supposed to be sure for Harrison disappointed everybody by rolling up handsome Democratic majorities. Vermont now gives women who are tax-payers the right to vote in school meetings. The lower branch of the Legislature has gone a step farther, and by a vote of 149 to 83 has declared in favor of giving them municipal suffrage. Vermont is so much ahead of Massachusetts in the matter of doing justice to women, though, to borrow her own vernacular, "it ain't much to brag on." There was a very fair number of Prohibition ballots cast, both at Wellesley and Holyoke, although the general vote stood overwhelmingly for Harrison. Think of all those cultured Christian women—president and professors, denied a voice in saying who shall rule them! But it is not always to be so. Again the Republican party has seen the handwriting on the wall, but their heart has been made gross, and their ears heavy, and their eyes they have shut, that they may neither see nor understand. But has the Prohibition party fully grasped its opportunity? The falling off in the Prohibition vote this year, in Massachusetts, is not entirely due to the unwise action of extremists. Many a good Prohibitionist voted for Harrison because he knew that with Cleveland and his Tammany allies in power, Rome would have free course and dip her hand more deeply than ever in the government Treasury. It is time that the third party ceased to fight shy of the Romish question, or pat Romish ecclesiastics on the back because, forsooth, they are good temperance men, unmindful of their record as avowed enemies of our public schools, and all our precious heritage of religious freedom. In this way it has repelled many a conscientious voter from its ranks. It must broaden out and become a National Reform party in every sense of the word before it can hope to win; but at present it looks as if the leaders were too hopelessly wedded to the "one-reform-at-a-time" idea, to seize the golden opportunity before it. Let them beware lest it pass them by forever, and be given to another party yet to be born out of these conflicting elements.

Our annual meeting will soon be here, and if all sleepy "New Englanders" have not been aroused by the trumpet call sent forth by our agent and secretary, good Bro. Stoddard, it must be because they have been spiritually chloroformed. I have read strong and noble words from his pen before, but none with a more inspiring ring. It is the call of a great heart, and ought to find a response in every soul in which there is a single spark of the old Puritan fires. Let all go up to this meeting who can, and those who cannot, send a substitute. New England, drowsy as she may seem on the lodge question, is beginning to wake out of sleep, and the rising day whose light is to scatter every work of darkness is nearer now than it ever was before. God has graciously given us unexpected financial enlargement the past year. Then is it not meet that we should go up to his courts with thanksgiving, gratefully acknowledging his mercies? Some have been called to lay their armor down and go up "higher" since we last met. We owe it to them, we owe it to God, to see to it that their empty places are filled. The tide of anti-secret sentiment is rising all around us. The lodge is no longer a tabooed subject. People as a rule are willing to talk about it and express their opinions; and it is marvelous, when one looks at it from the standpoint of former years, how many without any knowledge of an organized movement against secret societies have been led to regard the whole Masonic system with dislike and suspicion. Talking with a gentleman, the other day, a fine-appearing man, who, having lost his right arm in a saw-mill many years ago, now peddles articles of domestic use for a living, I found him in full sympathy with our cause, though perfectly ignorant of the work our Association is doing, or the parent organization at the West. He had formerly been an Odd-fellow, he told me, but had left the order because it had no Christ in it; and when he became a Christian he had no use for two religions, one of which excluded his Saviour. There are thousands to-day who would be thankful to hear of our organization; thankful to get hold of our literature. Let us go in a spirit of faith and prayer, and plan great things, not for ourselves, but for Him whose kingdom we are seeking to hasten. And allow me, as a woman, to say just a word to my sister women, especially they who wear the white ribbon. If you know nothing about the lodge and the harm it is doing to the church, the family and the state, it is time you did. If you already know a little, you ought to know more. Masonry, like a wall of brass, stands behind the saloon. At the great World's Convention of Christian Workers, now holding in Tremont Temple, Rev. E. F. Atwood, Chaplain of the Wethersfield State prison, stated the startling fact that "while we have a million of young men in our churches, we have over a million in our prisons." The open saloon, we all know, is a feeder to the jail; but the secret saloon behind a tyled door, where many a mother's boy has learned for the first time to smoke, and drink, and listen to foul stories, has had, in nine cases out of ten, more to do with the downfall of our native American youth. "We have," said this same speaker, "twenty-four graves in Connecticut of girls who were betrayed and murdered, and their murderers are still at large." What has stood between these men and the punishment justly due their crime? The same dark, secret, irresponsible power that protects the rumseller. More and more this subject is beginning to appeal to the attention of thinking women. Come and hear what Mrs. A. J. Gordon has to say; and also Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason, who will speak on "Masonry from a Woman's Standpoint." Let us, one and all, men and women, crowd the M. E. church on Bromfield street, December 14 and 15. Let us come in prayer and faith, remembering that if the foe is strong we have One to lead us who is infinite in power. Let us not, by stupid inaction, miss our opportunity.

The convention of Christian Workers has been the most notable gathering ever held in Boston, unless we except the W. C. T. U., last fall. Every department of practical Christian work has been discussed, and eager crowds have stood about the doors unable to get in.

In reference to the "Boys' Brigade," a letter just received from Bro. Conant informs me that in Willimantic the meetings for drill are held on week-days, but at Sunday-school they meet in citizens' dress to receive Biblical instruction. This is probably the way in which the Brigades are conducted in other places, including Glasgow. The charge of Sabbath desecration cannot therefore be laid against it; yet, while I am happy to say this, one can see that the great point at issue remains unchanged,—and that is the fostering of the military spirit by the church and in the name of the Prince of Peace. Let us leave such tactics to Rome, and train up our Protestant youth to handle the sword of the Spirit instead of Springfield rifles, and to put on, instead of the uniform of carnal warfare, the whole armor of righteousness. Spiritual wickedness in high places would tremble before the oncoming of such an army, and in the dark days which the wisest among us foresee approaching, this is the kind of Boys' Brigade that will be needed. ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

A year's numbers of the Cynosure would make six good-sized volumes of valuable reformatory literature, containing 550 pages each.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16, 1892.

It is raising no new charge to say that there is rottenness in the ranks of the municipal officials of the District of Columbia; but the charge has been very strongly confirmed, this week, by the conviction in court of two police officers of having for months been regularly bribed by the conductors of that pernicious form of gambling known as "policy;" and what makes the conviction all the more alarming to those having the moral welfare of the residents of Washington at heart, is that these two policemen had been specially detailed to break up "policy" playing, which, according to the testimony at this trial, robs the poorer classes of this city of something like $5,000 a day. In other cities such a disgraceful affair might be considered as entirely local, and, owing to peculiar political conditions, liable to occur; but in Washington it is a national affair, and Congress is directly responsible for it. The citizens of Washington have no votes and but little influence in the selection of the officials who are in immediate charge of its affairs; Congress is its only law-making power, and the appointment of its officials is in the hands of the President of the United States.

The officials of the Postoffice Department are having considerable trouble about deciding upon the designs for the series of Columbus stamps, which are to be exclusively used while the World's Fair is open. These stamps are to range in value from one cent to five dollars; and the intention is to begin with an early scene in the life of Columbus and follow with other scenes, a different one on each denomination of stamps, in regular chronological order up to his death. The trouble arises from doubts as to the time of certain happenings and as to the portrait of Columbus that shall be used. The part of Third Assistant Postmaster General Hazen's annual report (soon to be made public) that deals with this matter is very interesting.

The preliminaries of an educational movement which is pregnant with great possibilities, are being quietly manipulated from Washington. Its success is largely dependent upon the responses from those most directly interested. During the late G. A. R. encampment, a resolution was adopted by the Union Veterans' Union, endorsing the idea and authorizing the appointment of a committee to organize and incorporate "The Union Veterans' School of Science and Agriculture." This committee, of which Rev. (Gen.) Green Clay Smith is chairman and Gen. Neil Dumont secretary, is now at work interesting the old soldiers in the project. The school is to be located, if the movement succeeds, on a 10,000-acre tract of land, yet to be selected, which shall embrace timber, coal, iron and suitable lands for grazing, and for all branches of agriculture and horticulture, and scholars are to be graduated in all branches of scientific and mechanical industry. Although the school is to be under the control of ex-soldiers, its scholarships are to be open to all, and the sons and daughters of ex-soldiers who are unable to pay the small charges that will be made will be taken free. It is to be co-operative and the capital needed is to be obtained by disposing of stock; its projectors believe that once established it will soon become self-sustaining. Merely as showing how the idea strikes practical business men, it may be mentioned that an offer has already been made of the outright gift of 300 acres of land in Tennessee, if the school will locate there, and a number of tracts in other States have been offered at nominal prices. It is easily possible for the members of the various soldier organizations to make this scheme a practical success at a very small cost to themselves, twenty-five cents from each ex-soldier giving it a capital sufficient to begin; and many will watch with interest the result of the appeal the committee is now making to them.

Rev. Frank M. Goodchild, the Philadelphia evangelist, began a series of meetings in the hall of the Y. M. C. A. building Sunday afternoon, which are to continue all this week. Mr. Goodchild is a forceful and convincing speaker, and his meetings are being well-attended.

How many people know that the membership of the W. C. T. U., including the young ladies' branch, and the children of the Loyal Temperance Legion, has reached in the United States alone the enormous number of 350,000? I hardly thought it was as large, myself, until Mrs. Ruth Shaffner addressed the District of Columbia branch, last Sunday, on "The World's and National W. C. T. U.—What it Has Done." Among the things she mentioned as having been done was the procuring of 10,000,000 signatures to petitions for prohibition. It maintains the largest publishing society of women in the world, and is annually issuing 130,000 000 pages of printed matter, all used in pushing its great work of moral reform. The figures furnish a subject for thoughtful study. *

REFORM NEWS.

THE IOWA ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

FIRST SESSION.

The Iowa State Christian Association (auxiliary to the National Christian Association), met in annual session in the Wesleyan Methodist church of Marengo, Iowa county, at 2 o'clock, P. M., Tuesday, November 15, 1892.

The president, Rev. L. Mendenhall, called the convention to order, and led in devotional exercises.

The address of welcome and the response thereto were postponed for the present, and made the order of the day for that evening at 7:20; an announcement of the illness and consequent absence of Mrs. Dunham having been made.

Rev. T. P. Robb read a paper on the subject of "Anti-secrecy Reform Work in Iowa."

This was followed by remarks from Bro. John Dorcas, the only one who answered the roll-call of those who attended the first convention.

Rev. W. I. Phillips, Rev. M. A. Gault, and Rev. S. A. Gilley, pastor of the church, made brief addresses appropriate to the occasion.

A few lines, received from Bro. W. L. Enlow, Treasurer of the State Association, and editor of the Birmingham (Iowa) Free Press, were read, advising the convention of his serious illness, and stating that he had not been able to prepare a formal report of his transactions, but that there is a balance of about $50 00 in the treasury, subject to the order of the convention.

A communication was also received from Sister Enlow, confirming the statement of her husband's sickness.

The convention thereupon ordered that a telegram of consolation be sent to Bro. Enlow; which was done as follows:

"MARENGO, Iowa, Nov. 15, 1892.—W. L. ENLOW, Birmingham, Ia.: The Iowa Christian Association extends sympathy. Read Deuteronomy 33: 26, 27.—L. MENDENHALL."

A committee, consisting of Bros. Dorcas, Gilley, and Fink, was appointed by the chair to consider the question of the relations which the Association ought to sustain to the Birmingham Free Press.

Rev. J. Marks, of Kellogg, Ia., Rev. G. R. McBurney, of Avery, Ia., and Rev. W. I. Phillips were introduced to the convention and extended words of endorsement and encouragement.

A recess was taken until 7 o'clock in the evening.

SECOND SESSION.

At 7:15 P. M., Tuesday, the convention was called to order by Pres. Mendenhall.

Rev. W. I. Phillips led in the devotional exercises, reading Psalm 46; prayer by Rev. Mr. Williams.

The president stated that a telegram had been received from Mrs. W. L. Enlow, announcing that her husband passed peacefully away this afternoon.

A committee, consisting of Rev. T. P. Robb and Rev. S. A. Gilley was appointed to prepare a suitable minute, to go upon the records of the Association, and also a letter of sympathy to be sent to Mrs. Enlow and her family.

Rev. S. A. Gilley delivered the address of welcome to the convention; to which an appropriate response was made by Pres. Mendenhall.

The address, "Temperance in Iowa," which had been announced to be delivered by Mrs. M. H. Dunham, president of the Iowa W. C. T. U., was omitted, on account of her absence through sickness.

Rev. M. A. Gault orally addressed the convention on "The Relation of Minor to Major Secret Orders."

A half hour was then passed in conference on the general subject.

Bro. John Dorcas was elected Treasurer of the Association pro tem.

Adjourned, with a benediction, until Wednesday forenoon.

THIRD SESSION.

The convention reassembled at 9 o'clock Wednesday morning.

After devotional exercises, on motion, Rev. T. P. Robb was requested to prepare his address of the previous day for publication.

The Executive Committee presented its annual report, which was read, discussed and adopted.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

To the Iowa Christian Association:

Your Executive Committee would report:

The committee held three meetings during the year, at one of which the members were all present.

Besides planning for the present convention, your committee, early in the year, endeavored to establish a lecture bureau, and were successful in securing the consent of quite a number of persons to deliver lectures on the subject of secretism. Under this plan, two lectures were delivered at Fairfield. No doubt other work was done at different places, but we have not been apprised of the fact.

We suggest that the bureau work might be developed into a good agency.

We suggest, also, that a good work is possible, by the establishment of a department of literature.

We suggest that the Executive Committee ought to be enlarged by at least two additional members; and that those members shall be representatives of different reform churches.

Respectfully submitted.

For the committee:

L. MENDENHALL, Pres't.

T. P. ROBB, Sec'y.

MARENGO, Iowa, Nov. 15, 1892.

Committees were appointed as follows:

Resolutions.—W. I. Phillips, W. C. Paden, J. Marks.

Enrollment and Plan of Work.—M. A. Gault, J. Dorcas, G. R. McBurney.

Nominations.—S. A. Gilley, J. Dorcas, F. J. Williams.

Finance.—T. P. Robb, M. A. Gault, W. C. Paden.

Bro. Gilley stated that he would, on the morrow, move amendments to the constitution of the Association, touching articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and the addition of another article, to be numbered 3, and hence the renumbering of the present No. 3 and subsequent articles.

FOURTH SESSION.

The afternoon session opened with devotional exercises.

Rev. W. C. Paden then addressed the convention on "The Secret Lodge System."

FINAL SESSION.

The evening session began at 7 o'clock with devotional exercises.

Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard had been announced to address the convention, but as he was detained at home by sickness in his family, Rev. T. M. Chalmers and W. I. Phillips were substituted, and delivered stirring speeches.

After a brief conference, the convention adjourned sine die.

[The foregoing report is incomplete as it gives neither the nominations for officers of the State Association, the resolutions adopted by the convention, nor the plan of work for the future. All have been delayed, but we hope to have them in time for the next issue of the Cynosure.—EDITOR.]

THE IOWA STATE CONVENTION.

ON TRAIN, Nov. 17, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Last week, on my way to Marengo, I addressed good meetings at Hickory Grove, Oskaloosa, Cedar, Nassau, Guernsey and Fairview. Of these meetings I will write more again.

I had purposed to spend the Sabbath at Grinnell, but on Saturday morning I obeyed an impulse to go to Marengo. It was well that I did, for I found that almost no local arrangement had been made for the State convention. Rev. S. A. Gilley, who had invited the convention to Marengo, and on whom we depended for the local arrangements, had been called to a distant part of the State, and could not be home until the day before the convention. His church, where the convention was to meet, was two miles from Marengo, in the country. He had been for months in the Prohibition lecture field, and had been recently transferred to the church at Des Moines; so that for some time there had been very little preaching in the church. I occupied the pulpit twice on Sabbath, and on Monday billed the town.

In spite of all the untoward circumstances, we had a remarkable convention. The good Wesleyan brethren, though taken by surprise, and ill-prepared to entertain a convention, took us to their homes and made us welcome. Although our two prominent speakers, Pres. C. A. Blanchard and Mrs. M. H. Dunham, were detained at home by affliction, yet Secretary W. I. Phillips, of Chicago, and Rev. Thomas M. Chalmers, of Topeka, Kans., were present, in the good providence of God, to take their places. Bro. Phillips gave us a stirring address, which made us appreciate more than ever the great work carried on by the National Christian Association. His wise counsels in important business matters before the convention was a great help, and made us thankful for his presence. Bro. Chalmers gave us a strong, radical, incisive address, the last evening. His clear statements in proof of the anti-Christian character of Freemasonry, and the place it occupies in prophecy, are sufficient to startle any audience.

Bro. Paden also gave us a fine address; and the address of welcome, and the response, by Bros. Gilley and Mendenhall, were timely and practical.

The presence of Rev. T. P. Robb, and John Dorcas, for many years leading workers in the State Association, was an inspiration; also the presence of Rev. Julius Marks, of the Congregational church at Kellogg.

The sad intelligence of the death of Bro. Enlow reached us the first evening and cast a gloom over the convention. Constant reference in our prayers was made to the stricken widow and fatherless children. In a reform association, as in an army, care should ever be exercised for the dead and wounded.

All in all, this meeting of the Iowa Association, with its lights and shadows, was an impressive gathering not soon to be forgotten. Much time was spent in organization and constitution revision, and we recalled C. H. Spurgeon's idea of a most efficient committee: It was a committee of three, and when one was sick and the other could not attend, the business was promptly transacted by the third.

M. A. GAULT.

AN ENCOURAGING LETTER FROM M. N. BUTLER.

BLOCKTON, Iowa, Nov. 18, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—At Lamoni, Iowa, last Saturday, I called at the well-equipped publication headquarters of the Church of Latter-Day Saints, and had a pleasant talk with the management, Joseph Smith and W. W. Blair. They are posted on this line, and take no stock in Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, or other secret orders. The "prophet" assured me that he had never as yet joined a secret society; and I have heard members of this branch of the church contend that his father, Joseph, Sr., lost his power and made the mistake of his life when he united with the Masonic order. Let that be as it may, Brigham Young certainly used his Masonry to seat himself in the place rightly belonging to Smith's son as his successor. The whole Utah outfit is Freemasonry gone to seed, and Joseph, Jr., is at war with Brigham Youngism and leads the revolt with its headquarters at Lamoni. He has heard Edmond Ronayne and Pres. Blanchard, and seems to have decided opinions on oath-bound lodgery.

An interview with the local paper, the Independent Patriot, proved the editor to be free from lodgery, and he spoke plainly on the matter.

Eight miles southwest of this place we met that staunch veteran of reform, Harmon Patrick, and his sons. Father Patrick wishes to sell his splendid 100-acre farm, that he may locate near a school to educate his youngest son. His team and buggy did good service in transporting myself and literature through the rural district. A Bible-reading was given Monday night to a good audience. Bro. Chesley, O. M. Farmer, Riley, Strickland and others solid in this cause reside here.

THE CHURCH'S RESPONSIBILITY.

GALVA, Ill., Nov. 10, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—References have been made in the Cynosure, during the months past, to the fact that the churches are being overrun by the lodges. These complaints are not without foundation. It can hardly be doubted or denied that many of the churches throughout the land are largely under the power and control of the lodges. This is a deplorable state of things, and should be deprecated by every lover of truth and righteousness.

But may there not be another view of the matter? Is it not true of individuals that if they "fear God and work righteousness," according to the light they have, that God will use means to lead them out into greater light? Instance the case of Cornelius and also the Eunuch. Where the opposite transpires, and the individual is captured by enemies, is it not because he ceased to use and walk in the light he had? Is not the same true of churches? If the members, or a large proportion of the members, of a church were true to God and faithfully following and serving the Lord Jesus Christ, according to the light received, who can harm that church? If built on the sure foundation—the everlasting Rock—the powers of hell cannot prevail against it. A live and growing tree in a Southern forest is not likely to have poison ivy, greenbriars, and other vines twining about and growing into it. It is doing its own work too well to invite such things to its embrace. But a tree that is dead, or half-dead, will perhaps be bearing a goodly number of such worse than worthless vines, and also some bunches of mistletoe. This, I think, illustrates the case of those churches infested with the greenbriar and poison ivy of lodgeism.

If they had been live churches—the members "living branches in the true Vine"—bearing fruit as well as leaves for God, there would have been no place for these foul vines to creep in and get a hold. Lodgery and Christianity do not flourish together. As one goes in, the other must go out. Where Christ truly reigns, lodgery is likely to stand aloof until by some means Christ is dethroned, when it is ready to usurp control. Thus, I think, it is with those churches that are being overrun or honeycombed by the lodges. They failed to follow Christ—to walk in the light given—and darkness and lodgery came in.

Alas for such churches! No longer green and beautiful by the foliage of a pure and spiritual life, the only verdure being that of the wild and poisonous vines and some bunches of mistletoe; dead trees, with their vines and mistletoe, they are together made fuel for the flames.

But how watchful and zealous should those be, who "have not this (lodge) teaching, which know not the deep things of Satan?" "For I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." R. CANNING.

THE METHODS OF FREEMASONRY.

DALTON, Georgia, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—In company with a friend, a few months since, I attended the funeral of a neighbor. We went to the house, and there we found the Masons were to take charge of the funeral (the deceased belonging to that fraternity). They came, but they had no exercises whatever at the house. From the house they went directly to the cemetery. After depositing the coffin in the grave they marched around, throwing in their sprigs of evergreen, a glove and an apron. Then they threw their hands up over their heads with a spat, repeating it three times; then the Master Mason made a speech, eulogizing Masonry. They sang a hymn, had a prayer and then dispersed. All this took place within a few rods of my husband's grave. I almost wondered that he did not rise from his dusty bed at such "twaddle."

I begin to think he is wearing a martyr's crown. He risked his life here amongst the Masons (for they are legion). They used to tell him he had a martyr's spirit, he talked so plainly to them; and I more than suspect that he was drugged by the doctors, who were Masons. It became necessary for him to submit to a surgical operation. He was in their office two days and one night, up stairs, lying on the floor; so I have been told. When he went into the doctors' hands his system was in a first-rate normal condition, he never using meat, tea, coffee, condiments, or tobacco. His system was so unused to stimulants that it over-powered him, and he came home dazed and never rallied. At the end of two weeks he peacefully passed away.

There is a rumor afloat that he was drugged by the doctors. His death was a mysterious one to me; that is why I have taken it so hard. He ought to have lived ten or fifteen years longer, and he might if the laws of life had not been broken; but they were broken, and death ensued.

The circuit minister said in the pulpit that no one knew anything about Masonry that had not been behind the curtain, or into the "holy of holies." Such a comparison is bold blasphemy. There is not a church here in Dalton that does not tolerate the lodge. There are so many under the ban of Masonry that ministers dare not utter their convictions. After reading the Cynosures I give them to my neighbors; but some refuse to accept them. A Mason refused them, and his wife said she would take some; but her lord said No. Another man, not a Mason, does not want to read them; neither can he be persuaded to read Carradine's sermon. He is a Mason at heart, but is too poor to join them. I can say, for one, I am not under the ban of Masonry. I just tell what I think about their institution, and believe I am the only outspoken reformer in Dalton; and by the help of divine aid, I will do my duty.

MRS. A. C. HAND.

MEANS AND ENDS.

CHICAGO, November, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—That system of moral philosophy that teaches that "the end justifies the means," or (in other words) "that it is right to do evil that good may come," has commonly been ascribed to the Jesuits. Their leading writers disclaim any such principle of conduct. Nevertheless, it is true that not only Jesuits, but hosts of Protestants, do act upon it.

It is only on this false principle that men seek to justify war, the licensing of the liquor traffic, Freemasonry and the political misrepresentations that are put forth on the eve of an election, when it is too late to refute them.

These are things of everyday occurrence, and Protestant Christians had better stop talking about Jesuitism and Jesuitical practices until they reform.

Not one of the above-named practices can be justified on its own merits; and yet, strange to say, the great majority of our American Protestants practice, or consent to some or all of them. When shall we cease to cultivate a principle which Paul repudiated, and held that he was slandered when charged with its adoption?

LITERATURE.

A JOURNEY TO PALESTINE. By Rev. B. Carradine, D. D. One volume, cloth; pp. 489. Syracuse, N. Y.: A. W. Hall, Publisher. 1892.

The Rev. Dr. Carradine, known very favorably to Cynosure readers by his vigorous "Sermon on Secret Societies," which has gained a wide circulation, is the author of this delightful book of travels.

Not only is he a close observer of men and things, but he has invested this volume with peculiar interest. While his descriptions of what he heard and saw by the way are in themselves attractive (for his journey led him through various countries and among many classic and historic scenes), he possesses the power of introducing incidents, drawing inferences and making references to Scriptural events in a cheerful Christian spirit. Although his style is free from the sarcastic vivacity of "Mark Twain," he often displays a pleasant sense of humor, that provokes a smile.

The details of the journey to New York, on the Atlantic, in Great Britain, among the lakes and mountains of Scotland, on famous battlefields, among olden abbeys, churches and castles, his saunterings about London, his visits to Paris, the Rhine, Venice, Rome, Naples, Vesuvius, and the Egyptian Pyramids, prior to reaching Palestine, form a considerable and very entertaining portion of his book.

Palestine was, of course, full of interest for him, as it is for every Bible student, and his interest and enthusiasm are largely manifest in his descriptions of sacred localities. From first to last he invests them with a magnetism in which the Christian reader cannot avoid participation, while the lessons deduced from the present and the past of the Holy Land appeal to the heart's best affections.

Certainly it is a book to be enjoyed in every well-regulated household.

FROM THE PULPIT TO THE POOR-HOUSE, and Other Romances of the Methodist Itinerary. By Jay Benson Hamilton, D. D. One volume, cloth; pp. 204. New York: Hunt & Eaton; Cincinnati: Cranston & Curtis. 1892.

Mr. Hamilton has a laudable mission—the care and comfort of superannuated Methodist ministers. He does not believe that an itinerant clergyman who has labored fifty or sixty years in behalf of the Gospel and the church which he represents, and has been dropped from the rolls because he is old and gray-headed, should be left, with his old companion, either to starve or suffer incarceration in a cheerless poor-house. He believes, rather, that it is the duty of the church to provide for these faithful old servants—to supply every need of their declining years; to see that they do not suffer—that they, who have spent the best strength and time of their ministry in and for the church—often scrimped and starved while in the harness—should not be turned out to die in poverty and neglect. If the cases of these valiant-for-truth old heroes are half as distressing as set forth in this volume, the church should hide its head and wallow in dust and ashes until it repents and reforms. Mr. Hamilton wields a graphic pen, with an apparent understanding of the needs of these superannuated veterans, and he writes like a man terribly in earnest—as well he may. He calls his narratives "romances," but romance, if other utterances which we have seen from his pen are realities—and we believe they are—is not stranger, in this case, than the truth. He tells a story graphically, his descriptive passages abounding in pathos mingled with wholesome pleasantry, true to the foibles of human nature, with one great purpose—to arouse the church to a sense of its duty—to promote Christian charity at home, as well as elsewhere, in behalf of the poor, whom we have always with us. Profits arising from the sale of this volume are devoted to the furtherance of this worthy cause. Its price is one dollar.

"Child's Christ Tales," by Andrea Hofer, is a new holiday gift book for the children, telling the Christ Life in short, simple tales, appealing in their freshness and exquisite pathos to even the mature reader and lover of the wondrous character of Jesus. Miss Hofer is the editor of the Kindergarten Magazine, and interprets these marvelous stories of love and salvation in the light of a student of the child heart and mind, and the book certainly gives the most intelligent rendering of the theme we have ever been able to offer the lambs of the great Christian flock.

The volume is exquisitely printed, illustrated and bound and prepared in such a way that it may be put directly into the hands of the children themselves to read from. Address, Kindergarten Magazine, Woman's Temple, Chicago. Price, $1.

PERIODICALS.

Our Day for November is, as usual, the expositor of valuable current reforms. Rev. Frederic P. Noble contributes a thoughtful article on Africa at the Columbian Exposition—a topic which was editorially referred to in last week's Cynosure; Mr. Moody's Schools at Northfield and Chicago, furnish material for an able paper by ex-Pres. G. F. Magoun; Rev. Dr. Pentecost treats of Aggressive Christianity among Pariahs and Brahmins; Prof. J. E. Rankin furnishes the customary "Boston Hymn;" Rev. Joseph Cook's Boston Monday Lecture embraces the subject of Fraudulent Elections, North and South; "Vital Points of Expert Opinion"—President Storrs on Marco Polo and Columbus—The Divine Ideal for Mankind—and Contributions of America to the World's Progress. "Questions to Specialists"—The Future of Religious Denominations in Boston, discussed by Joseph Cook and M. J. Savage. Book Notices, and brief Editorial Notes on the Lake Mohonk Indian Conference—Liquor-Selling at the World's Fair—The Death of Lord Tennyson—and the Chicago Meeting of the American Board—conclude an excellent number. Published at 28 Beacon street, Boston.

Mark Twain has settled down for the winter, with his family, at Florence, Italy. He has just sent a story to the Century, which will appear in the January number. It is called "The £1,000,000 Bank-Note."

OBITUARY.

MILTON M. FORD

was born in York county, Ohio, Nov. 22, 1805, and died at his home in Washington, D. C., Nov. 9, 1892.

His childhood was spent in Ohio. About 1837 he married Mary Lovell and moved to near Jamestown, N. Y. To them were born four children, two sons and two daughters. Of this union the daughters alone remain. About 1845, he moved west, locating on the Allegheny River, above Pittsburgh. His latter years were spent in Washington. Here, a widower, he was united in marriage to Mrs. E. B. Holmes.

At an early age he accepted Christ as his Saviour, and was enabled to live long and usefully with eternity in view. Though conscious of many weaknesses and imperfections, he never lost his hold on Christ or his hope in the atonement. Sixty-five years ago he united with the Presbyterian church in Jamestown, N. Y., and was, at the time of his death, a member of the First Presbyterian church of Washington. Though of a quiet, retiring disposition, he sought ever to live as he prayed.

He was interested in all true reforms as he understood them. He carefully avoided the use of narcotics and liquors of all kinds. As a storekeeper in an early day he refused to deal in intoxicants. His failure was predicted by some who regarded the sale of liquor by the grocer as essential as that of bread. But he lived and prospered.

He was one of two in Jamestown, N. Y., to vote for James G. Birney for President. In the dark anti-slavery days his house was on "the underground railroad," he being the passenger agent.

His regard for the Sabbath was marked. When engaged in rafting lumber down the Allegheny River, on various occasions he refused to travel on the Sabbath, though urged to do so by professed Christians.

The boat on which he had secured passage when returning from a lumbering trip was belated, thus failing to reach its destination on Saturday evening. Rather than travel on the Lord's day, Mr. Ford accepted the invitation of a Scotch Presbyterian whom he met on the boat, went ashore, remained over Sabbath, and walked on the following day to the town where he lived, a distance of some thirty miles. On the arrival of the boat some hours later he learned that it had been stranded on a sand-bar and the crew spent much of the Sabbath in trying to get it afloat. This and similar instances coming under his observation strengthened his convictions as to the impropriety of traveling on the Lord's day.

Of late years he has taken more than usual interest in the anti-secrecy and temperance reforms. The excitement and downfall of the lodges, occasioned by the abduction and murder of William Morgan for revealing the follies of Freemasonry, were indelibly stamped on his memory. When the National Christian Association, opposed to secret societies, secured a home in this city, he manifested his interest by aiding the work. Its official organ, the Christian Cynosure, was looked for each week and read with interest.

His long life, so filled with labors, has closed. He has gone to his reward. His works alone remain. His life has blessed the world so far as he has lived to the glory of God and the good of his fellow-men. We shall miss his counsel and aid, but feel assured that what is our loss is his eternal gain.

The writer officiated at the funeral, taking as his text, 1 Peter 1: 3, 4.

IN BRIEF.

WONDERS FROM A WELL.

On the 7th of July, 1890, workmen engaged in sinking an artesian well in Sandy Valley, near Niria, N. M., struck an open seam from which a cold stream or current of air rushed with such force as to remove a 12 pound rock that had been placed over the opening. This current of air was charged with millions of

HOW YOUR NAILS GROW.

The time taken for the tissues of your left hand to give you a complete change of nails is from eight to ten days more than that required for a renewal of those on the right hand. The growth is also known to be more rapid in children than in adults and goes on faster in summer than in winter. It requires an average of 132 days for a renewal of the nails in winter and but 116 during the spring and summer months.

Freemasonry is pagan in its origin, devilish in its principles, and hellish in its destiny —REV. O. P. GIFFORD, of Immanuel Baptist Church, Chicago.

THANKSGIVING.

President Harrison some time ago, by proclamation, appointed to-day (November 24) as a day of thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God. As usual, the official call to worship on this day made no mention of the Lord Jesus Christ and what we owe to him as the dearly "beloved Son" of God, in whom he is "well-pleased." To offset the seeming impiety of this practice, the United Presbyterians issued a similar proclamation "in the name of Christ, our King, to whom all thanks are due," setting apart the day appointed by the President of the United States. No Christian will object to this "improved" form. Will our rulers ever conform to the usages of a Christian nation?

THE IOWA CONVENTION.

We give place, this week, to a summary of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Iowa State Christian Association at Marengo, November 15 and 16.

Marengo is on the Iowa river, in Iowa county, as well as in the State of Iowa; perhaps it was appropriate, therefore, that the convention should have met where it did.

As an auxiliary to the N. C. A., and composed of men strongly opposed to secret societies and their evils, the State convention wisely discussed the situation and the prospects of the reform, and laid out a plan for more effective work during the coming year.

The proceedings were solemnized by the report of the unexpected death of W. L. Enlow, the Treasurer of the Association, and an active opponent of the lodge.

The convention, throughout, maintained the spirit of the reformers by whom it was called, and, we trust, will result in much good to the cause in which we labor.

GREEK-LETTER FRATERNITIES IN CHICAGO UNIVERSITY.

At the beginning of its second term, with an enrollment of 600 students and a Faculty of distinguished educators, the new Baptist University finds itself confronted with the anti-secret-society question in a manner at once annoying and healthful.

If the question of maintaining Greek-letter fraternities within its precincts shall prevail, we are assured that it will not be in harmony with the desires of President Harper, who has expressed his views with commendable plainness; but here is the trouble: Several Greek-letter societies have already established themselves in the University, and this adds to the difficulty of the problem with which the Faculty has to contend. Their opinion, as voiced by Dr. Harper (says a daily paper), when for the first time he met the whole body of students after the opening of the institution, was decidedly against the introduction of secret societies. The Faculty did not prohibit them, but left it to the students as individuals to decide. Said a student: "There certainly will be a chapter of some Greek-letter society formed before long. Dr. Harper has left it to us to decide, and a number of us have decided that a college fraternity is a good thing for the student as well as the college."

A large following, however, think otherwise. Their opinion is expressed by the following editorial in the University News, the students' daily paper:

"Only one thing now remains to be done by every loyal student of the University of Chicago, and that is to abide by the decision of the Faculty. Many of the students here have been to colleges where, on entering the doors, a formidable list of 'thou shalt not's' has been handed to them. So far there have been no rules here. The introduction of secret societies means the introduction of rules."

Here, for the present, the subject is held in abeyance.

THE COLUMBIAN EXHIBITION AND PEACE.

The recent Peace Congress at Berne, Switzerland, besides considering many important questions in reference to international peace, voted to hold its next annual session in Chicago next year, at the time of the Columbian Exhibition. There will doubtless be represented the peace societies of Europe, and the movement will arrest the attention of all Christian statesmen and philanthropists. The civilized world has become sick of war. From motives of mere prudence they shrink from it as an unspeakable evil. It is not simply the infusion of Christian ideas into the thoughts and plans of rulers, but the immense cost of war and the conservatism of commerce have held back the nations from fratricidal strife. For the last ten or twelve years the political prophets have told us that a European war was in the near future. Nearly every winter they have told us that there would be war in the spring, and yet the vernal rays dispelled the war-cloud, and Europe has had peace. Each succeeding year makes a European war more dangerous for all parties, and therefore more unlikely.

Our great Exhibition, like all others of a similar character that have preceded it, will be in itself a powerful argument for international peace. The representatives of the nations of the world will see here a great and prosperous people who have the mere skeleton of an army, and whose navy is surpassed by other nations greatly inferior in numbers and wealth, yet not only without fear of aggression, but inviting all peoples of all lands to the enjoyment of our hospitality. It is greatly to be desired that the coming Congress may be able to suggest some plan for an international tribunal for the settlement of all difficulties, and that all civilized nations may see it to be for their highest interest to have a representation in such a tribunal, and to pay due respect to its decisions.

SPECIOUS REASONING.

"If there is a demand for benevolence and charity which the church fails to supply, and its members are driven to seek these in the lodge, the church to be consistent cannot expect such members to cast the energy, time and money, necessarily expended in securing these blessings, into the church treasury. That Christians seek membership in these orders is largely due to the fact that the church has proved inefficient in supplying a legitimate demand for that benevolence and charity which the lodge is supposed to furnish."

So writes H. E. Garrett, of Salt Lake City, Utah, in the Christian Standard of Nov. 5.

This advocate of the lodge starts out on false premises, if he is a Christian; but he argues more like a Freemason, who is never willing to concede that the Christian church is superior to his fraternity in importance or usefulness.

Take the ground, as every true Christian must, that the Church of Christ is paramount to any human institution, in every respect, and the foregoing paragraph will not stand in the judgment, and should have no weight among the followers of the Saviour.

If the church fails to supply a proper demand for benevolence and charity, it by no means follows that this is a sufficient excuse for any of its members to forsake it, and take refuge in a Christless, selfish organization, whose "benevolence and charity" have existence only towards those who are able-bodied, "sound in wind and limb," and possess the willingness and ability to pay their lodge dues with promptitude.

Instead of fleeing from the church and uniting with the lodge, every member who does so dishonors Christ and his church. His course, in case the church is derelict in her duty, is to rebuke her, enliven her, pray for her, work for her revival, put his money, time and talents into her work, and thus, by example and precept, help to place the bride of Christ in a position where she may worthily perform her duty to her absent Lord.

How much more manly, how much more Christian-like would he be, who would stick to his church and strive to elevate her above the lodge, instead of decrying her weakness, to which he contributes by his negligence and desertion to her enemies!

If lodge-church men will desert their lodges, and do their whole duty, the church will be the better and the brighter for their coming to her aid.

ACTION OF THE NATIONAL CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL.

This important denominational body, representing the Congregational churches of the country, gathers once in three years. At the late meeting in Minneapolis, through the efforts of Pres. C. A. Blanchard, a committee was appointed to consider the question of secret societies and report at the next meeting. This committee, as recommended by the nominating committee and appointed by the council, numbers five: A. L. Williston, banker, Northampton, Mass.; Pres. C. A. Blanchard, Wheaton College; Rev. Dr. E. P. Goodwin, First Congregational church, Chicago; Rev. Dr. Hawes, of Vermont; Rev. Dr. Baker, of Minnesota.

This committee was voted with practical unanimity; even Dr. A. Quint, who has long been understood to be the representative of Freemasonry among the churches of this denomination, agreeing to its appointment. The importance of this action cannot easily be estimated. It was not probably realized by the body itself. But, God helping, it shall do a good work for his kingdom.

GROWTH OF ODD-FELLOWSHIP.

The Odd-fellows of Illinois, represented by the Grand Lodge, the Grand Encampment, and the administrative powers of the Rebekah degree, in annual session at Springfield, last week, discussed several matters of importance to the order.

The grand secretary's report shows that since the last report the number of subordinate lodges has increased from 733 to 760 on March 31, and the membership from 38,858 to 46,241; that the total revenue of the lodge was $426,065 and the total relief paid out $141,800. The Rebekah degree lodges Dec. 31, 1891, numbered 245, with a membership of 14,220, being 6,948 brothers and 7,280 sisters. The receipts during the year were $16,674 and the expenditures $15,242.

Two important amendments to the constitution were considered: One providing for a permanent committee on appeals and one for the taking of all testimony in lodge trials by deposition.

The Odd-fellows' Orphans' Home, at Lincoln, has been recently completed and dedicated. The committee having charge of the preparation for the grand Odd-fellows' demonstration at the World's Fair in September next, also reports progress, and the Grand Master recommended a liberal appropriation for this purpose.

ANOTHER REASON FOR REPUBLICAN DEFEAT.

A special telegram from Columbus, O., to the Inter Ocean strongly intimates, with some show of reason, that the Roman Catholic church caused the recent defeat of the Republican party. "There must have been," it says, "some secret controlling agency at work upon a class of voters holding the balance of power in various States, with an ulterior object in view. That power was the Roman Catholic church. This, in the opinion of many Ohioans, is the solution of the problem, and it is in logical harmony with certain recent events in a number of States."

"Catholics all over the country have been greatly stirred up by the development of anti-

Catholic sentiment, which has crystalized into an organization known as the American Protective Association, or 'A. P. A.,' as it is commonly called, the avowed purpose of which is to check the tendency of the Roman Catholic church to grasp political power in the United States. The growth of this society has been phenomenal. Originating in the West but a year or two ago, it speedily made itself felt in local political fields, driving every Catholic from office in numerous cities of California, Colorado, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, and other States. In Detroit it caused the public school authorities to adopt resolutions which exclude Catholic teachers from the schools. Reaching Ohio last spring, it defeated every Catholic on the municipal tickets of both parties in Toledo. In Cleveland the same result was accomplished. In Columbus there are ten councils, with a membership of between 8,000 and 10,000. At the recent elections for county officers the only two Catholics on the Democratic ticket were defeated overwhelmingly, while the remainder of the ticket was elected by increased pluralities. The movement is steadily advancing eastward, and, at the present rate of growth, another year will see a vast secret organization, extending from Maine to California, bent upon restricting Catholic influence. No wonder the Catholic church was stirred into action in the presence of a movement so full of momentous consequences to itself. "Was there," continues the telegram, "a secret understanding between the church and the Democratic managers? The inference is that there was such an understanding."

The Western Catholic News says: "One of the heaviest clubs that struck Benjamin Harrison on election day was his pandering to bigotry and secret societies." "Plato, it must be so; thou reasonest well."

—It is significant that William H. White, an attorney of Boston, Mass., who is in favor of our reform work, and engaged by the N. C. A. in adjusting the Jackson will case, has been elected a member of the Massachusetts Legislature as the opponent of secret endowment orders.

—In a private letter, Rev. William Fenton writes in regard to the approaching annual meeting of the Minnesota State Christian Association: "The outlook is good for a grand convention." The program is printed on the first page of this issue. Minnesota affords a fine field for the anti-secrecy reform.

—A note from Bro. M. N. Butler (whose encouraging report from his field of labor we print elsewhere), states that he spoke near Kellerton, Iowa, where Rathbun was mobbed, and there he found seceded Masons and Odd-fellows. Providence willing, he adds, he will stir the craft in that vicinity. Bro. Butler is an earnest reformer.

—We publish on the first page, to-day, the program of the New England District Anti-secrecy Convention. Of this gathering, Rev. J. P. Stoddard writes: "It is devoutly to be hoped that the New England friends will be pleased with the program; that they will rally to the support of the cause and by their presence encourage the noble men and women whose names we present, which are a guarantee that the issues will be thoroughly and fairly treated."

—Our little contemporary, the National Home Guard, published monthly at 218 Columbus Ave., Boston, Mass., by Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, has changed its name to the more appropriate one of the Home Light. Small as it is, it is a stalwart opposer of secret societies, and an equally strong promoter of all healthful reforms. Its editor, our able and esteemed New England correspondent, Miss Flagg, retains her position under the recent change, and is doing excellent service.

—The Pastor's Helper, a Methodist monthly, speaks highly of the volume of Sermons and Addresses by the late Jonathan Blanchard, as "a very helpful and stimulating volume. These discourses will have a continuous interest, as they contain the utterances of one of the most fearless of American reformers upon the greatest issues of the century. A glance at the table of contents will assure the reader that interest and enthusiasm will be awakened in every subject discussed."

—Rev. E. F. Ward and his wife, who, twelve years ago, left this city as the first authorized foreign missionaries of the Free Methodist church in the United States, going to India, where they have performed arduous service among the heathen, have returned for a visit. Bro. Ward has had many interesting experiences and gathered much valuable information concerning the people among whom he has sojourned. They will remain in this country about a year to recruit.

—One day last week saloon license No. 7,000 was issued by the city authorities of Chicago. Within the past year the number has increased from 6,000 to 7,000. What a shameful record! And the worst of it is the statement of the city collector, that next year a greater increase will be noticed. Estimating the present population of the city at 1,500,000, we now have one saloon to every 215 souls. If we have 400 places of worship open on the Sabbath, that is one church for each 3,750 residents. The difference is appalling, especially when it is considered that not over one-tenth of our population ever attend Christian services. Our Sunday theatres, on the contrary, are densely filled with pleasure-seekers. Whither are we tending?

Striking Mt. Ayr, a stranger, by inquiry we learned of an opening four miles out, where a Bible-reading was given, and many staunch friends were found, giving us a basis for future co-operation. Evangelicals, Baptists, U. P.s, and M. E.s spoke boldly and radically against lodgery, and we found outspoken seceders from Masonry and Odd-fellowship. The public was never so ripe for this agitation as now, and men should be sustained in searching out and rallying the thousands who are simply awaiting a knowledge of the movement to soon be active with us.

We should know who are Americans in every community. The lodges keep a most complete record of their forces, and anti-secretists should know each other. A central headquarters for that purpose here and there might not be a bad idea. At least such for Iowa, Missouri and Kansas, having the names of reliable staunch reformers in every neighborhood possible, will man a line of forts connectedly the country through. I want the names of outspoken anti-secret people in those States. But more anon.

M. N. BUTLER.

FROM THE WESTERN DISTRICT.

ALBIA, Iowa, Nov. 19, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am now on my way to Missouri to work up the Missouri State Convention, which will convene at Albany, Gentry Co., November 29.

I am thus far on my way back from the Iowa Convention. Our convention was not large; but a band of earnest workers gathered together. Plans were put in operation to carry on the work better in the future. Money and means, and commanding influence are against us; but the Lord is on our side, which more than compensates. Yet the Lord means that we should have more means and influence, which we shall gain if we keep right on in his work in humble dependence upon him.

I shall not pretend to report the Iowa Convention. We were very glad to have Bro. Phillips present. His address on the evening of the 16th gave us much encouragement in showing the contrast between twenty years ago and now in this work. There is a healthy growth of anti-secrecy sentiment. We all thank God and take courage.

We are perfecting our program for Missouri Convention, and will publish it in a few days. Let the readers of the Cynosure, within reach of Albany, be with us and help forward the cause. In the Lord's work,

W. C. PADEN.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

SCIO, Ohio, Nov. 12, 1892.

In my journey through Ohio to this place I visited Kenyon College, at Gambier, on the 3d inst. It is an Episcopal institution, and supposed to incline to conservative views. But the president, Dr. Theodore Sterling, seemed to be liberally disposed, and said he would like to have our reform books in the library; so I arranged to send them. This is one of the older colleges in the State. It has three departments—the college, a theological school, and a preparatory school or military academy. It is well-furnished with large and costly buildings, a fair library, and a reading-room for the use of the students.

On the 9th I went to Granville and visited Denison University, which is sustained and managed by the Baptists. It appears to be doing an excellent work; has a large number (I think 400) of young men, in the classes, who crowd the chapel at prayers, and render lively several large halls, when going to and coming from recitation. I consulted the president, Dr. D. B. Purinton, and the librarian, Prof. W. H. Johnson, and they appeared pleased to receive our reform books, and to give them a good place on the shelves of their library; and I accordingly ordered them.

I next stopped at New Concord. The United Presbyterians are strong in the town, and have built up Muskingum College, which is a fine and growing institution, standing steadfastly on the side of truth and righteousness, and opposed to all selfish, oath-bound secret orders. Prof. T. H. Paden, who is the brother of Rev. W. C. Paden, of the Western Department of the N. C. A., told me that they wanted some anti-secrecy books. The Christian Cynosure comes weekly to the reading-room; it is also taken by a number of the congregation who are intelligent and strong anti-secretists. The Rev. J. M. Faris, pastor of the church, is a conscientious and firm reformer. He entertained me kindly and gave me brotherly encouragement in my work.

At Scio, Harrison county, where I am stopping, the college is a M. E. institution. It has about 220 students in the various departments; and seems to be doing an important work for the young people of this region. I saw the acting president, Prof. W. G. Compher, who approved of my proposal to place some anti-secrecy books in the library, and he became responsible for their return if they were molested. I had a pleasant interview with the pastor of the Presbyterian church, who seemed to approve of our labor of love for the truth. There is also a United Presbyterian church in Scio, whose pastor is outspoken against secretism and lodgery—the Rev. J. L. Achison. I called on him and passed a pleasant hour in discussing ways and means for beating back the powers of darkness and building up the kingdom of Jesus and light.

S. F. PORTER.

A LETTER FROM REV. WM. FENTON.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Nov. 18, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—To illustrate what the Prohibition party may expect by "going down to Egypt (Freemasonry) for help," as God has expressed it in the Bible (for Freemasonry is the ancient religion of Egypt mentioned in the Bible, and all secret societies are Freemasonry, i. e., in the spirit of Freemasonry), a young friend of mine writes to me from Grand Forks, N. D., that he has been stoned by the Freemasons in Pembina county; and he states, as follows: "To show how hard it is to convict a Freemason, I will tell you I went on the witness stand, and under oath produced the liquor that I bought of him, recognized him on sight, and gave my evidence; and when the jury came out, the verdict was 'Not Guilty?'" The Judge is a Freemason, and I suppose the jury was also. Is that sworn justice? If it is, I do not want any of it."

We are hoping and praying for a good convention on the 29th and 30th, at New London.

The pastor of the Central Presbyterian church of this city, Rev. Dr. Alex. Carson, informed me that he sees nothing wrong or contrary to Christianity in Freemasonry, and, also, that for six years he has been a teacher of Freemasonry. Of course, it follows from this that he is nothing less than a falsifier and blasphemous, sold and sworn to the devil, and, outwardly, he does not appear to know it. Since my interview with him, one of the elders of that church has been to see him about it; and they seem to be trying to effect some sort of a compromise in the matter, I hardly know what. However, the pastor remains blind and in the darkness of the lodge-devil, for he tells the elder that he sees nothing wrong about Masonry. Unless that church loves darkness rather than light, it must come to the light. It must stand committed on one side or the other. We put this question to it: "Who is on the Lord's side?" Let him come to the light. Yours truly,

W. FENTON.

THE HOME.

COUNT THE MERCIES!

Count the mercies! count the mercies!
 Number all the gifts of love;
 Keep a daily faithful record
 Of the comforts from above.
 Look at all the lovely green spots
 In life's weary desert way;
 Think how many cooling fountains
 Cheer our fainting heart each day.
 Count the mercies! count the mercies!
 See them strewn along our way!

Count the mercies, though the trials
 Seem to number more each day;
 Count the trials, too, as mercies;
 Add them to the grand array.
 Trials are God's richest blessings,
 Sent to prompt our upward flight,
 As the eagles' nest—all broken—
 Makes them fly to loftier height,
 Count them mercies! count them mercies,
 That bring heaven within our sight.

Let us number all our jewels,
 Let us estimate their worth;
 Let us thank the gracious Giver,
 Strewing blessing o'er the earth.
 Let our hearts overflow with gladness,
 Let us tell the wonders o'er,
 Till our multiplying treasures
 Seem a countless, boundless store.
 Then let praises, grateful praises,
 Be our language evermore.

—Mary D. James, in the Moravian.

"REMEMBER THY CREATOR."

"Lift up your eyes on high and behold who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host by number. He calleth them all by names by the greatness of his might, for that He is strong in power: not one faileth."—Isa. 40: 26.

There is but one astronomer who knows the names of all the stars; to all others the very existence of many, if not most of them, is entirely unknown. The range of the most powerful telescope takes in but few of the stars just about us, while no one has ever ventured to say, "With my glass I have taken in the outmost star."

The eye of the Creator alone has seen the farthest star, if there is such a thing, and has given it its name. He calls them all by name and gives them the proper orbit and velocity and everything else necessary for their orderly motion, suitable for themselves and all their fellows.

And when they hear the voice of this great Astronomer they come—"not one faileth;" every one of them is on time—always was—always will be till time with it is no more.

A beautiful illustration of this was seen by a visitor to an observatory. On requesting to look through the telescope, the astronomer asked his assistant if there was any star soon due. The assistant looked upon his table and replied, "Yes, in two seconds." The visitor had just time to reach the telescope when the star appeared, and the tables just referred to were printed a hundred years before, so exact is the motion of the heavenly bodies; any one versed in astronomical matters can tell, to a fraction of a second, just when and where any given star may be seen. No such exactness, kept up for such a length of time, was ever known in any of the works of mortal man.

Now the wisdom and power manifested in the creation and conduct of these heavenly bodies is just as manifest, if we could but see it, in our Creator's dealings with us. At the set moment for our deliverance, he will be there to the second, with all the needful help. "He that shall come will come and will not tarry." No power can hasten his coming; none can hinder it. Why then should we not rest all our affairs in his hands, assured that he lacks neither the wisdom nor the power nor the faithfulness to redeem every pledge.

This is abundantly shown by the order of the heavenly bodies. On time and always on time, is a peculiarity of our Heavenly Father and of him alone; it can be said of no mortal; we all fail some time or other, often from causes over which we have no control.

God's faithfulness is also abundantly shown in his dealings with his people; and what bungling and often sinful work are we sure to make when we try to anticipate the fulfillment of his promises instead of waiting for his time.

It has often been shown too in his dealings with his enemies, and will still more be shown in days to come. "Their foot shall slide in due time." So they may take a warning, while his servants find a blessing, from the thought of his faithfulness, and we shall all come to the same conclusion at last: "O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee."—Faith's Record, November.

"THE NIGHTINGALE OF THE REFORMATION."

Hans Sachs was the son of a tailor, born in Nurnburg, Nov. 5, 1474. He began as apprentice to the shoemaking trade at 15. Practically all the education he got was under his own teaching. And his spare time was given to poetry and music. When he attained his majority, after the fashion of his time he traveled from town to town as a journeyman shoemaker.

This excellent fashion, which gives the workman an opportunity of perfecting himself in his trade and seeing something of the world, obtains in Germany to some extent to-day; but it is rapidly being trampled out by machinery and the establishment of large factories.

Hans Sachs went singing, rhyming and cobbling from town to town. When he returned to Nurnburg he was known as an excellent shoemaker and a good poet. In his movement for the reformation of religion, Martin Luther had no more vigorous and valuable supporter. Hans Sachs' songs did as much as Luther's sermons to make the Reformation popular with the humbler sort of people.

He died at 82, leaving an enormous mass of literature—poems, plays, songs, religious dialogues and "merry tales." The value of this self-educated shoemaker's attainments is best shown by quoting the opinion of Frederick Schlegel: "In minstrelsy, as in daily life, Hans Sachs was a workingman. He was not only the most copious, but the most forcible in his own style of art, particularly witty, and possessed of strong common sense. Compared with early authors in literature of other countries, he is more inventive than Chaucer, richer than Marot, and more inventive than either. As regards his diction, the rich mine of treasure he has bequeathed can hardly be said to have been yet made the most of."

This shoemaker's apprentice became one of the few great poets of the world. And it was no mean achievement.—Anonymous.

CHRISTIAN MOTHERHOOD.

"His mother made him a little coat." There is a home touch of nature in this passage from the second chapter of the Book of Samuel. Away back in those far away lands and ages, there was a young wife whom the Lord blessed with an infant son, and her joy was overflowing. "For this child I prayed,"—exclaimed the devout Hannah—"and the Lord hath given me my petition. Therefore I have lent him to the Lord." This solemn vow of consecration was never broken. If all the good promises which Christians make to God when they present their children for baptism were as faithfully kept, then a very sacred rite would become—not a barren form, but a source of inestimable blessings.

Hannah placed her little son Samuel in the care of the High Priest Eli in the house of the Lord at Shiloh. Moreover, "his mother made him a little coat," and brought it to him when she came to offer her annual sacrifices. What sort of a garment could the wee tunic or mantle have been? We do not know exactly; but we may believe that so sensible a mother did not degrade her only child into a doll. I wish I could say as much of thousands of Christian parents in these days who overload their children with costly finery. As if God did not make a child beautiful enough without being the tongs and screws of fashion and disfigured with extravagant upholsterings! This folly strikes through into the child's heart, poisoning it with pride and greed of admiration and vainglory. How can a child be taught humility and frugality, and that best of all lessons, self-denial, while its graceful form is smothered under the artificial trappings of fopperies and frivolities? Self-indulgence is the besetting sin of the church in these days; and one of its seeds is planted early, when a child that has been nominally dedicated to God is degraded into an overdressed doll.

But this little coat which Hannah made for her only boy has a far deeper significance. In the Bible, clothing has a figurative meaning; Christianity is spoken of as a vesture, and believers are commanded to "put on Christ," so that whenever they are looked at their godly character may be as visible as the garments they wear. In heaven the saints are said to be clothed in white raiment, which has been washed to a celestial purity by atoning blood. It is not a mere pun to remind my readers that the word "habit" is used to signify both a bodily dress and also the disposition of the mind toward good or evil. Mothers clothe their children, in both senses of the word. They provide the raiment for their bodies, and, in no small degree, the habits for the mind and heart. God puts into your hands, oh ye mothers! an unclothed infant form. You make for your children the "coats" which no moth can eat or time deface—the coats of character! They are the mental and moral garments which your children are likely to wear through their whole lives. When you send your children away to school or college, you send with them and in them the family likeness. And the characters you are weaving for them—stitch by stitch, every day—will outlast your lives, and may be worn by your children when they stand before the judgment seat of Christ!

This coat-making for your offspring is enviable and unavoidable. Your children will put on your ways and your habits in spite of you. Your character streams into them—through their eyes and through their ears, every hour. What they see you do, they will do. What they hear from you will lodge in their memories, and come out in their conduct. How quick is a child's eye to observe, and how ready is a child's mind to receive indelible impressions! No photographic plate is more sensitive to the images which are painted on it. As Dr. Bushnell has happily said: "Every sentiment that looks into the little eyes, looks back out of the eyes, and plays in miniature on the countenance." A fright on a parent's face will frighten her child; a smile will kindle into a sunshine on the face which photographs the mother's.

The most effective part of education is really atmospheric. You mothers commonly create the earliest and the most influential atmosphere for children's habits and hearts. The unconscious influence, too, is the most abiding. You may honestly want your boys and girls to be good, pure, truthful, unselfish, lovable—yes, you may sincerely desire them to be genuine Christians. Yet your daily influence may be most unconsciously working right into the opposite direction. Your needless irritations irritate them, and sour their dispositions. Your dissimulations make them tricky and deceitful. If your boy is handled harshly or jerked into obedience, he will probably turn out a sulky, obstinate, irritable chap—just what your rude impatience made him. If gossip and scandal make a large part of your table talk, then your children's teeth will be set on edge. If you give your son a dollar for the toyshop and only a dime for a Christian contribution box, you thereby teach him self-indulgence is just ten times as important as charity. You may fancy that the play-house is a safe school of morals and that the ball room is a safe school for refinement of manners; but if your daughters shall have learned quite too many things in those schools, how will you like the apparel that you made for them? Remember that you are making the coat of character for your children. If you fashion it after a worldly pattern, then they may be poisoned with worldliness; but if you devoutly "seek first for them the kingdom of Christ and his righteousness," and if you draw them by the powerful traction of a lovable, winsome Christian example, then you may hope to see them arrayed in the "beauty of holiness."

Faithful, painstaking, prayerful Hannah! The little coat she made for her boy was the type of the character which he wore when he became the upright Judge of Israel. Timothy's little coat of piety outlasted his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois. Susannah Wesley was more than mother of John and Charles; she was the mother of Methodism, and her dead hand rings ten thousand church bells in America every Sabbath. If all the ministers in our land were asked to name the most powerful influence which brought them to Christ, the vast majority of us all would trace our conversion back to maternal teachings and example. For one, I can honestly and gratefully say that my good mother's prayers and influence were worth to me more than all the wealth of the Astors and the Rothschilds. The patient, loving hands that wove for us the "little coats" may have crumbled into dust, but the characters that faithful Christian motherhood produces, will live

And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment book unfold."
—Rev. T. L. Cuyler, in the Independent.

IF I WERE A BOY.

I wouldn't be ashamed to do right anywhere.
I would not do anything that I would not be willing for everybody to know.

I wouldn't conclude that I knew more than my father before I had been fifty miles away from home.

I wouldn't go in the company of boys who used bad language.

I wouldn't get in sulks and pout whenever I couldn't have my own way about everything.

I wouldn't let any other boy get ahead of me in my studies.

I wouldn't abuse little boys who had no big brother for me to be afraid of.

I would learn to be polite to everybody.

I wouldn't cry for anything when mamma or papa told me it was not good for me.

I would try to see if I couldn't get people to like me, by being civil to everybody.

I would never make fun of children because they were not dressed nice.

I would try to learn something useful every day, and whenever I saw men making anything I would watch to see how they did it.

I would keep my hands and face clean, and my hair brushed without having to be told to.

I would be respectful to old people, and behave so that my parents would not be ashamed of me.

I would be in earnest about everything. When I had to work I would do it with all my might, I would study with all my might, and I would play with all my might.

I would read books and papers that would make me want to know something, and do something, that would benefit other people.

I would have as good a time as I could in this world, but I wouldn't tell lies, nor steal, nor be mean to anybody.

I would pray every day, and I would ask Jesus to make me a good boy and show me how to go to heaven.—Exchange.

IF I WERE A GIRL.

I would take care of my health by living out doors as much as possible, and taking long walks in the sunshine. English girls understand how necessary this is for good complexions and cheerful spirits. Wear simple clothing, that you may climb mountains and breathe freely.

I would secure the best education. Go to college by all means if it is possible. Read good books and thereby become intelligent.

I would cultivate cheerfulness. Discontent soon shows itself in the face. If you have some disappointments, so do others. If you are cramped for money, be thankful that your lot is no worse than it is. Learn to make the best of things. An unhappy woman is a perpetual club in the home. A fretful girl has few friends, and the number lessens year by year.

I would say kind things to others, especially of the girls. A girl who makes unkind remarks about other girls would better be avoided by young men. She will not make an agreeable companion for life.

I would learn to be self-supporting. Especially in this country, where fortunes change, it is wise for a woman to be able to care for herself. Helpless women are not a comfort to others, and usually not to themselves.

I would try to be polite everywhere. True courtesy is more winsome than a pretty face and fine dress. Loud talk or loud dress does not betoken the lady. Be appreciative and sympathetic, and you have two keys which will unlock almost all hearts.

I would learn self-control. To know when to speak and when to be silent, have hateful things said about you and to be able to answer pleasantly, to have people confide in you and be wise enough to keep it locked in your heart, to be in poverty and not to be soured by it, to meet temptation and be strong before it, to be strong enough to perform any labor or duty that needs to be done—all this shows a noble mastery over self.

I would be punctual. Being late at meals, late at church, or late in meeting engagements makes unnecessary friction in families. If we are unwilling to lose valuable time, we have no right to make others lose it.

The golden rule of doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us, is especially applicable here.—Mrs. Jenness Miller.

CHRISTIAN ATTITUDES.

To Thee I come.
Nor from Thee go,
My living Lord.
In Mary's place
At Thy dear feet
I drink Thy word.

With Thee is life,
Without Thee, death,
Immanuel!
On Thee I lean.
Under Thy wings
I safely dwell.

In Thee is peace,
Thou in me, hope,
My Morning Star.
Before Thee, child,
Behind Thee, slave,
Not distant far.

TEMPERANCE.

THE BEER HABIT IN EUROPE.

[Germany is one of the countries from which the United States imports its municipal rulers.]

Statistics from northern and central Europe have repeatedly been quoted for the purpose of proving that the craving for alcoholic drink threatens to assume the form of an epidemic, and that the stimulant habit among millions of our fellow-men has acquired the force of a second nature. But the strongest proof of that fact is incidentally furnished by a pamphlet intended to demonstrate the ruinous tendency of over-taxation as a consequence of the enormous expenditures for standing armies, etc.

Circulars had been addressed to German mechanics of all classes, asking them to state the cost of living and rate of wages in their neighborhood, and the classified result has now been published by the committee of leading labor organizations. From that pamphlet it would appear that a plurality of such mechanics as masons, bricklayers and house-carpenters earn less than 1,000 marks (about $200) a year, and have to limit their household expenses to the absolute necessities of life; but among those necessities a considerable number of the respondents continue to include beer.

Thus one laborer from Erlangen, in the kingdom of Bavaria, states that his total earnings as foreman of a quarry are 950 marks a year; the aggregate added by his wife and children picking up odd jobs at washing, errand running, etc., about 100 marks more. Their house rent does not exceed 150 marks; clothing and shoes, 80; food, 750 marks (about $150 a year for a family of five); taxes and contributions, 40 marks; but the same family admit to be spending 120 marks for beer—while evidently cruelly stinting themselves in food and clothing, for the price of both are almost as high in Bavaria as in Illinois. And, moreover, that pamphlet is avowedly published for the purpose of demonstrating that with the utmost possible economy it is hard to make both ends meet under the present system of taxation.

In a suburb of Groningen, in north Holland, a gang of street arabs recently rummaged a country wagon while the proprietor was treating a friend in a neighboring coffee-house. One of the youngsters happened to see a pile of fodder covered with an old overcoat, and after removing an armful of straw, discovered a keg of Schiedam schnapps, the same liquor which our importers of foreign high wines describe as a "strengthening and exhilarating beverage." Not one of the little marauders was more than twelve years old, but their leader managed to procure a wheelbarrow that enabled them to trundle the keg out of town and along the tow-path of an old canal, where they turned into a side trail and lifted their prize over the fence of an out-of-the-way pasture. Here they encamped under a shade-tree and agreed to devote the afternoon to the pleasure of exhilaration.

After an hour and a half the prescription began to work, and the members of the symposium fell like Baresarks upon a flock of sheep at the other end of the pasture, ripping and stabbing away with their pocket-knives till the result would have kept their parents in mutton for the rest of the year. In the dispute for the prize of bravery, the young heroes, however, proceeded from words to blows, and at last to knives. Two of the young combatants were slashed in a horrible manner, two others got drowned in the attempt to escape across the canal, and one of the victors has since died from an overdose of alcohol.—Felix L. Oswald, M. D.

HOW THEY TALKED, AND HOW THEY VOTED.

CHAPTER I.

Rev. J. Howard Emlenton, president of the non-partisan temperance society, in calling the meeting to order, said:

"Ladies and gentlemen: The liquor traffic is the curse of the nation. [Applause.] To temporize further with it would be a sin, and our only course is to do all in our power to throttle the monster! [Great applause.] As this is a strictly non-partisan society, I shall not dictate to you gentlemen how you shall vote. As for me, I could not vote for the Democratic party, which is openly in favor of the traffic, and I consider it worse than madness to throw my vote away on the third party; therefore I shall vote for the glorious old party that preserved the Union and liberated the slaves." [Tremendous applause.]

CHAPTER II.

Fritz Bungstarter, president of the liquor league, waddled to the front of the platform, and addressed his fellow saloon-keepers:

"Boys, this meeting has been called to decide how we shall vote next election. We must defend our business, and the way to do it is to play between the Republican and Democratic parties. In this State it is to our interest to vote the Republican ticket. [Cheers.] That party faithfully carried out its promise to us to defeat the 'mendment, an' boys, we must stick by that party next Tuesday. [More cheers.] So long as we stan' by the Republican party, they will stan' by us; in fact, they can't stan' without us. The only danger to our business is that these old fanatical church members and temperance people will vote with the prohibitioners, but they won't do it; they love the 'grand old party' too well. [Derisive laughter.] I hev just heard that the non-partisan temperance society of this town are goin' to vote the same ticket as we fellows, an' every church member's vote will be just as good as a liquor man's for us. Now, boys, let us go down stairs an' take something on the 'grand old party.'"

CHAPTER III.

It's election day. Rev. J. Howard Emlenton and Fritz Bungstarter are both at the polls and cast their ballots for the "grand old party." And when all the ballots are in the box, and the votes counted, the angel Gabriel cannot tell the vote of the minister's from the rum-seller's, for both are for license!—People.

Did you ever hear of a town which published abroad, as an inducement to prospective settlers, the number of saloons it had within its limits?

Did you ever hear of any movement having for its object the advancement of any public interest which originated in a saloon or among saloon-keepers?

Did you ever hear a saloon-keeper saying to a would-be customer in the shape of a poor, wretched sot, "No, I cannot take your money. You have too much liquor now. Take your money and go and buy some bread with it for your starving wife and children?"

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The healing of a cripple.—vs. 8-10. This much resembles the account of the healing of the lame man by Peter and John in the beginning of their ministry. The apostolic miracles must of necessity have possessed many features in common, while yet each case had an individuality of its own. "Impotent in his feet . . . who had never walked." We have here a striking illustration of our state by nature. It is one of complete spiritual impotence. We cannot take a single step in the way of eternal life until God gives us "faith to be healed." "The same heard Paul speak." We may imagine that to this poor cripple the message he now heard for the first time proclaimed must have seemed like an open door leading him into a very paradise of blessed hopes; revealing to him a future life in which he would no longer be the helpless, deformed object of pity that he now was, but eternally strong and vigorous. Perhaps the thought that he had found such a blessed Redeemer made him forget entirely his physical condition. We only know that in some way, probably by the eager manner in which he drank in his words, he attracted the attention of Paul, who, reading in his face that he had faith equal to the demand thus suddenly made upon it, said with a loud voice, "Stand upright on thy feet." And though a cripple from his birth "he leaped and walked." When God gives the word of command we can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us, for that in itself carries with it the power to obey.

2. Christianity and heathenism.—vs. 11-18. Such a miracle as this would naturally make a profound impression on a heathen people who had been accustomed from childhood to think of their deities assuming human forms at will and mingling in the affairs of men. None but gods, they reasoned, could perform such a work. They called Barnabas Jupiter, doubtless because of his noble and venerable appearance, and Paul Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker, Jupiter being the ruler and father of the gods, and Mercury the divinity which presided over eloquence. The conduct of the apostles when they realized that the deluded multitudes were actually about to pay them divine honors, is in striking contrast with the pretensions of false teachers, especially with Romish claims. "We also are men of like passions with you." This is not in the least like the doctrine of papal infallibility. Their object in preaching had been to turn them from the worship of idols, and now they were filled with horror at the thought of being made themselves the subjects of idolatrous homage. "The living God"—in opposition both to inanimate idols, and men who were subject to death. "Which made heaven and earth." One God, the Creator of all things, was very different from the heathen idea, which conceived of one deity as ruling over the sea, another over the woods and field, and still another over rivers and fountains. Ignorant and superstitious as they were, the question must have occurred to the minds of the more thoughtful, "Why have we never heard of this before?" Paul goes on to give a partial explanation why. "Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways" yet "left not himself without witness." In the countless beneficent provisions of nature they might have read his love; in the "rains," especially mentioned because Lycaonia was peculiarly subject to drouth, and "fruitful seasons," filling their hearts with gladness, but alas! not with gratitude to Him who is kind alike to the unthankful and to the evil. Like Paul's sermon on Mars Hill, this address to the deluded votaries of heathenism deals entirely with natural religion. It would have, perhaps, been difficult, if not impossible, to have reached their minds by an argument based on the truths of Revelation. This shows the need that all religious teachers should make themselves acquainted not only with the inspired Word but with that other Bible whose pages lie strewn all about us, in every weed that grows, every bit of rock, and even every atom of the dust on which we tread. The folly of these poor heathen was perhaps not any more foolish than the man-worship we often see to-day; the popular adoration of a brilliant preacher, for instance, or the way in which reformers sometimes cling to a great leader, as if the cause he champions could not go on without him. This tendency to trust in the arm of flesh instead of God is very human, but in reality it is nothing but a species of refined idolatry, so that the tender warning of the beloved disciple is applicable to every age, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

3. Paul stoned.—vs. 19-22. So bitter was the rage of his enemies at Antioch that they traveled over one hundred miles to thwart his work at Lystra. In other days Paul had done the same thing, and as he sank insensible under the shower of stones, he may have thought of himself as drinking the same cup with the martyr Stephen. But, unfortunate as was his visit to Lystra, it was then and there that he gained his brightest and best-loved convert, Timothy, ch. 16: 1-3.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—At the late meeting of the Massachusetts Baptist State Convention the sum of $275 was raised, to be used in completing the monument to the memory of Isaac Backus, now being erected in North Middleboro. The New York Christian Inquirer says: "The Baptist denomination owes far more to Isaac Backus than to Roger Williams." He was a great promoter of civil and religious liberty.

—Rev. W. H. Young, Ph. D., formerly of New York City, goes to Chicago to open a school. Until recently he has been a professor in Acadia College, Nova Scotia.

—Here is a piece of history. The second permanent white colony of Ohio gave the name Columbia to the new settlement. Its leading men were Baptists. Had this anything to do with the fate of the infant city? Within sixty days after the first cabin was erected a tremendous flood in the Ohio river drove the colonists en masse to the neighboring hills, and the hopes of the embryo metropolis were annihilated.—Chicago Standard.

—Rev. Dr. William M. Taylor has resigned from the pastorate of the Broadway (N. Y.) Tabernacle. Six months ago Dr. Taylor suffered from a stroke of paralysis and obtained a six months' leave of absence. This vacation he spent in the country, and his health improved so much that it was hoped he would be able to resume his duties at the expiration of his leave of absence. Dr. Taylor, however, has been advised by his physicians to avoid all exciting work.

—There are four of the Baptist churches in Milwaukee pastorless; the First, the Fourth, the Bay View, and the Immanuel.

Value of buildings and grounds: Northwestern, $955,000; University of Denver is second, and Syracuse third. Total income: Boston, $160,244; Northwestern, $111,404; Syracuse, $110,331; Wesleyan, at Middletown, $70,029; Ohio Wesleyan, $61,184; DePauw, $50,000. Number of professors: Northwestern, 150; Boston, 95; Denver, 92; DePauw, 56; Syracuse, 52. These figures of course include the professors in all departments; those colleges having professional schools consequently head the list.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—Drs. John Hall and H. R. Booth have resigned from the directorate of Union Theological Seminary because of the attitude of that institution in withdrawing from the Presbyterian church. Dr. Briggs is the cause of the trouble.

—The Canada Presbyterian church requires a year's probation from ministers coming from other denominations.

—Rev. Dr. Carlos Martyn of Newark, N. J., has accepted the call to the pastorate of the Sixth Presbyterian church, Chicago.

—Rev. Dr. Matthews says that in the Presbyterian churches in Holland it is the rule for a man, when he begins to be sleepy in church, to rise and stand till he gets wide-awake again. It is not an unusual sight to see a dozen or more men standing at the same time.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Omaha Midland says: "It has been agreed by the local societies of Omaha that the tenth annual convention of the Women's General Missionary Society, which meets in this city in May, shall be held in the First church, Rev. J. M. French, pastor. . . . We are pleased to learn that the health of our brother T. M. Chalmers has so improved that he is able to resume work. He is laboring in Winchester, Kan., and will probably stay there for some time as stated supply. . . . All of our congregations in Omaha, with others, hold meetings preparatory to the evangelistic meetings to be conducted by Rev. B. Fay Mills, which will begin the last day of this month. . . . The dedication of the new Tarkio College buildings will take place Dec. 8. All are invited. The people there will keep open house."

It is an old-fashion notion that medicine has to taste bad to do any good.

Scott's Emulsion is cod-liver oil with its fish-fat taste lost—nothing is lost but the taste.

This is more than a matter of comfort. Agreeable taste is always a help to digestion. A sickening taste is always a hindrance. There is only harm in taking cod-liver oil unless you digest it. Avoid the taste.

HOME AND HEALTH.

EMERGENCY DESSERTS.

Every housekeeper has need of a reserve force of quickly prepared dishes, to be used in cases of extreme need, the same as a man needs a reserve force of money to carry on successfully any business enterprise. Where is the housewife who has not had to call into use this force to make the preparations for the family dinner ample enough for three or four unexpected guests arriving near the dinner hour, more especially in the line of desserts? We may have a sufficiency for our own dessert, but no more, and nothing makes a guest feel so unwelcome as to see his hostess has no pie. In all these cases something that can be prepared in half an hour is of untold value to the busy housekeeper. She can then feel that her dinner is not a failure, and devote herself with pleasure to the entertainment of her visitor, for although we may feel that any article of food wholesome enough to serve to those dearest to us is good enough for the accidental comer, it must be conceded that the enjoyment of entertaining is decidedly enhanced by the fact that plenty reigns. I will give a few of the ways I have used in these emergencies, or at times when busy with other duties until late, and have found they were very good. If you have a loaf of plain cake, cut in generous slices and put one on each plate. Cream pulverized sugar and butter together, making it as thick with sugar as possible, and season with vanilla or other flavoring to taste. Put a spoonful on each slice of cake and serve. If the cake has been cut and is stale and dry, use a dressing made in the following manner: one tablespoon of cornstarch, one heaping tablespoon of butter, a cup of sugar. Turn boiling water on until it is the thickness of starch. Let cook a short time. Flavor and turn on the cake warm. Another very nice way of using old cake is to take one cup of sweet cream, beaten with an egg-beater until quite thick, stir in the white of one egg beaten to a stiff froth, sweeten and flavor. The cream will thicken with very little beating if not too old, and is very cold. Turn over the cake and serve at once.—N. W. Christian Advocate.

FARM NOTES

KANSAS WHEAT EXPERIMENTS.

Prof. Georgeson's experiments with wheat at the Kansas Experiment Station have included 234 varieties. He expects next year to be able to select a few of the best for future comparison. The results of the experiments for the last two years are summarized as follows:

1. The "experimental acre" yielded 31.3 bushels of Currell wheat; the average of twelve years, including two complete failures, is 23.81 bushels, and the average of the ten crops harvested is 28.57 bushels.

2. No conclusions can as yet be drawn from the rotation plats. So far, the plats continuously in wheat, without manure, have given the best returns, the manured plats being so rich that the wheat lodges and does not fill out.

3. The plats seeded Sept. 10 gave the best yields.

4. Mature seed gave a better yield than immature seed.

5. Of the methods of seeding tried the past season, the shoe drill with press wheels gave the best results.

6. Two years' experiments in pasturing wheat agree in the conclusion that pasturing decreases the yield.

7. Two bushels of seed to the acre gave a larger yield than any less amount of seed.

8. In two years' trials, heavy, plump seed has given better yields than lighter grades.

AGRICULTURAL.

Why cannot the cheap rice of Louisiana be used by the farmers there, instead of oats, for their horses and mules?

Those engaged in agitating better roads in Tennessee claim that the farmers of the State lose $7,000,000 each year through bad roads.

It is said that binder twine to the value of $12,000,000 was made and sold in the United States last year. Cheap twine-making machines have done much to supersede the use of wire in binding grain.

Farmers in Johnson county, Missouri, are complaining of the number of grasshoppers that are doing great damage to the late corn and new wheat which is just coming up. Hundreds of acres of wheat have already been destroyed.

Would it not pay a farmer who has more straw than he knows "what to do with" and who lives near a livery stable or other institution where horses are kept, to furnish straw for bedding in exchange for all the manure made? We know men who believe it does.

Drainage, tillage, clover, manure-saving; this is the grand four-horse team that will pull any farmer out of the quicksands of debt, if he will make use of it. The farmer working this team will need no special legislation or two per cent loans. With this four-horse team it was not difficult to raise twenty-five to thirty bushels of wheat and 150 to 200 bushels of potatoes per acre.

Any and all efforts that seem to tend to a practical solution of the problem how to get better common roads in the United States, are worthy of encouragement. In many States there are societies devoted to road improvement, but in many others the movement exhausts itself in talk. A union of all those who take an interest in the subject, into a national league, will strengthen the movement and hasten the day when the various parts of the country shall be joined together by good and permanent highways, in place of the streaks of dust and rivers of mud that are now misnamed roadways, but which disgrace the name.

The final harvest estimates of the crops of Great Britain, published in October, give the yield of wheat to be 24.1 bushels per acre in England, 23 bushels for Wales, 33.5 bushels per acre for Scotland, and 29 bushels per acre for Ireland, a general average under 24 bushels per acre on the 2,299,000 acres given in the official returns as being laid to wheat this year in Great Britain, Ireland and the Channel Islands. This indicates a total wheat crop of 56,325,500 bushels, against 4,743,700 bushels last year. At least 160,000,000 bushels of wheat must be imported to meet home consumption during the next twelve months. Very poor prices are being realized for home-grown wheat, as the quality is exceptionally bad, and it is mostly used to mix with wheat brought from America.—Farm, Field and Stockman.

BEEES.

By careful watching, most bee-keepers could save choice drones and rear queens enough for their own apiary, either between the summer and fall harvest, or after the fall crop is gathered. We feed our nuclei and drone colonies when our queens are old enough to mate, so as to have all flying at once, and lessen the chance of any mismating.—Progressive Bee-Keeper.

The best time to put foundation starters into sections is in the morning, before you need them. The best time to give sections to your colonies is the minute they are ready for them and honey is coming in; but the best time to make up your sections is in the winter, when there is plenty of spare time. I use section-holders or broad frames, and handle the sections, after they are made up, in fours.—F. Greiner, in Gleanings.

Checked—the progress of Consumption. It's cured, too, if it's taken in time. What is needed is the one unfailing remedy for Scrofula in all its forms—for one of those forms (Lung-scrofula) is Consumption.

Purify your blood—that's the first thing. Rid it of the taints and poisons that make it easy for this dreaded disease to fasten its hold. Then if you haven't delayed too long, you can be cured.

From beginning to end, the remedy is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It's the most potent blood-cleanser, strength-restorer, and flesh-builder known to medical science. Consumption, and every form of Scrofula and blood-taint, all yield to it. For Weak Lungs, Spitting of Blood, Bronchitis, Asthma, and all severe, lingering Coughs, it's an unequalled remedy—and the only one for the Blood and Lungs that's guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in every case, you have your money back.

Catarrh

Generally originates in a cold, or succession of colds, combined with impure blood. Disagreeable flow from the nose, tickling in the throat, offensive breath, pain over and between the eyes, ringing and bursting noises in the ears, are the most common symptoms. Catarrh is cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla, which strikes directly at its cause by removing all impurities from the blood, building up the diseased tissues and giving healthy tone to the whole system.

An obliging Chicago detective released a prisoner upon the latter's displaying a G. A. R. button. Presumably this detective understood his lodge obligation; and yet we are told that the G. A. R. is "not a secret society."

A letter from Rev. S. F. Porter, the College agent, reports that he has been visiting colleges and universities in Southwestern Ohio and West Virginia, in the reading-rooms of which he found acceptable openings for depositing several of the anti-secrecy libraries for the benefit of the students. Among others, he visited Bethany College, in West Virginia, which was formerly controlled by Alexander Campbell, and from which he issued his anti-secrecy tracts, and books advocating his peculiar religious views. Bethany is also now the site of the Disciples' publishing house.

The expiration of the terms of twenty-three Senators will leave as many seats in the Senate to be filled with new men. Of these, thirteen will be Democrats, nine Republicans, and three People's partisans. There will be no vacancy in any seat now filled by a Democrat (barring accidents), and they gain five from the Republicans—one each from California, Montana, New York, Wisconsin and Wyoming. Senator Stewart of Nevada ("Populist") will be re-elected, and his kind of politicians gain Senators also from the Republicans in Kansas and Nebraska.

President Harper, of the Chicago University, in his recent address to the students, "discouraged the formation of secret societies, believing that whatever of good is aimed at in these societies may be gained by other means, free from the objections of secrecy, of rigid exclusiveness and of antagonism to the democratic spirit such as belongs to the true scholarship, the best manhood, the noblest citizenship." The church of Christ, however, has a more important lesson to teach—a higher object in opposing the lodge, which is the enemy of Christ, and at best only a relic of the ancient pagan worship.

We expect by next week to definitely announce the Wisconsin State Convention. Rev. J. B. Galloway, the president of the State Association, now residing at Poynette, Wis., writes that a hall can be obtained, and a good interest secured in that town. There are many friends of the cause in that part of the State, and Bro. Gault is arranging to hold meetings at every available point in the vicinity. He and Bro. Galloway will make every effort to secure all the local interest possible. We earnestly request that every society and congregation in the State, in sympathy with the cause, will hold meetings and send delegates to this convention. Especially do we desire pastors to attend and help to make this the best convention ever held in Wisconsin.

Strikes and rumors of strikes, with other and milder upheavals of the labor question, continue to disturb manufacturing districts all over the country, and there is the usual amount of crimination and recrimination flooding the press, as to the relations of master and man that does credit to neither. Will these vexed questions ever find a settlement on Christian principles? The capitalistic trusts and the secret labor lodges seem inadequate to harmonize their interests, which should be mutual and conciliatory.

The general assembly of the Knights of Labor, last week, declared in favor of restricting immigration to such persons as have money enough to support themselves one year; favoring the passage of a law prohibiting any one from voting who cannot read his ballot, the provisions of the law to take effect five years after its passage; in favor of a law abolishing the sweating system; in favor of the continuance of the State bank tax, reaffirming the assembly's position regarding the restriction of the issuance of money except by the government; opposed closing the World's Fair Sunday, and refused to interfere with the matter of selling liquor on the grounds. But why wait five years for the enforcement of an important election regulation? Better to make it an "emergency" law.

The trial, for heresy, of Prof. Henry P. Smith, of Lane University, at Cincinnati, is fairly begun. He is charged with having publicly declared his abandonment of some essential features of the doctrines of the Presbyterian church; that the Holy Spirit did not so control the writers in the Holy Scriptures as to make their utterances absolutely truthful; that is, free from error when interpreted in their rational and intended sense; and that, while alleging that the Holy Scriptures are inspired is an infallible rule of the faith and practice, he denied in fact their inspiration, which inspiration is attributed to the Scriptures by the Scriptures themselves and by the confession of faith. Prof. Smith does not retract anything that he has said, but defends his own case with the claim that his teachings and writings are not heretical.

THE WORK IN IOWA.

A PAPER READ BEFORE THE IOWA STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION, NOV. 15, 1892.

I do not know what was in the mind of the friends who assigned this topic to me, but I see in it a two-fold line of consideration; and I shall take up these two thoughts:

I. View the subject in the retrospect.

II. Our future prospects.

I. THE RETROSPECT:

When was the work begun in Iowa? I cannot reply. The date of the organization of the Iowa Christian Association only marks an era in the work. If I am asked to fix the beginning of the influences of the Gospel, I shall say, just when the fallen race first heard of a way of salvation. The birth of our Lord Jesus Christ is usually pointed at as the beginning of the Gospel. Mark begins his wonderful book with the words: "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." If we take his entire sentence, it tells us the same truth that I have stated above. There were glad tidings, from the day that God said to Eve: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." All through the Old Testament the voice of gladness was heard, as the result of the enunciation of salvation. Mark

WISCONSIN.

The Wisconsin State Convention is expected to meet about Dec. 28 and 29. Poynette, Columbia Co., on the C. M. & St. P. R. R. midway between Madison and Portage, has been proposed as the place of meeting. Rev. M. A. Gault is now in Wisconsin, and will hold meetings during December at as many points as possible in the State. He proposes to lecture two weeks in Columbia and Sauk counties, in order to work up the greatest possible interest in the convention. Additional information is to follow later.

tells us the story of the beginning of that period of the Gospel of salvation, when our Lord Jesus Christ was personally present, to give permanency to the fact by his own life and death.

So in our work, we can fix a date when it took an organized and definite character, thereby uniting the friends of the cause in one body and making their testimony efficient.

But before this time there was a voice, which spoke clearly, and with power.

As early as 1840 there were some families scattered about throughout this State, "who had not bowed the knee to Baal," and there must have been some churches organized, from whose communion secretists were excluded. I do not know the date of the early organization of the Associate and the Associate Reformed work in the State. Whenever the first of these churches took on an organized form, they exhibited before the world a testimony against the empire of darkness. I think a careful reading of the history of those two bodies will show that they faithfully guarded the sanctity of the ordinances of God's house by refusing to allow them to be mixed up with rites and ceremonies which were of heathen origin, and which corrupted the worship of God. But in the month of September, 1846, a congregation was organized in southeastern Iowa by representatives of the Illinois Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church. That was the beginning in Iowa of the testimony of those known as Reformed Presbyterians, or better known as Covenanters.

This church holds ultra grounds on questions of reform. They believe that Christ ought to be recognized along all the legitimate avenues of human life, and they push the logic of their convictions to a practical application. They look at the United States Constitution, and because they do not find Christ there they refuse to swear allegiance to that Constitution, or cast a vote in an election where the elected candidate will represent them in the taking of an oath of allegiance to this Christless Constitution. They look into the lodge, and at the door they are met by the demand that they take an obligation to secrecy, before they become members. They refuse, because the Scripture says: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Then the fact is universally known that Masons and many others leave out any recognition of Christ; and so you may expect that Covenanters will not become associated in a voluntary association which has left Christ out. So we have these three church organizations appearing early in the history of the State, and all along the State's years of development, giving the voice of testimony against the system of secretism.

There are other churches—the Free Methodist, the Wesleyan Methodist, and the Friends—who also have stood in the breach, and lifted up their voices. They "cry aloud and spare not." "They show the house of Israel their sins."

About the year 1858, by a union of the Associate and the Associate Reformed churches, a new organization took its place among the sisterhood of churches, called the United Presbyterian church. On this question of secretism they spoke out clearly, unequivocally, scripturally, in their testimony, and they added greatly to the force already in the field. Truthfulness requires me to say that the force of their testimony is somewhat weakened by the recent actions of the body in General Assembly, in which they take action favorable to what are known as minor secret orders. But they have not changed a single word of their noble testimony, and we have faith that they will not. In that body are many ministers and members who have the courage of their convictions, and whose voice is uttered in timely rebuke of the evils of secretism.

Dr. McMichael, president of Monmouth College, delivered the closing address at our last State convention, and his argument was conclusive.

Last summer, I listened, with the most unmingled satisfaction, to Brother Ferguson, of Loveland, Colo., while he showed how much the Gospel of Jesus Christ could and did exalt men above any possible honor bestowed by the degree of Knight Templar level. But the friends of light felt that, as the lodge-bound influence was a unit, so the voice of the churches' testimony ought to be unified. To this end a number of friends met, on the 4th day of March, 1875, in Eldorado, and organized the Anti-secrecy Association of the State of Iowa.

The records give meager information as to the origin of the call. All that is recorded is: "Pursuant to a call issued in due form, the friends of the anti-secrecy reform in Iowa met at the courthouse in Eldorado, March 4, 1875." Then follows the names of persons present as delegates. First among these names—one who has been first along the line of this reform in many States—is J. P. Stoddard.

Let me to-day call the roll as it appears on that first record, and as many as were enrolled delegates that day and are present to-day, let them indicate the same: J. P. Stoddard, T. Palmeter, L. Howard, J. Hawkins, J. C. Hopkins, E. B. Kephert, D. J. Wilson, J. McLeary, A. C. Morfet, J. Dorcas, M. Hubbert, C. Crompton.

All friendly to the cause were accredited places on the floor of the convention.

Rev. James Hawkins opened the meeting with prayer.

E. B. Kephert was chosen chairman, and C. Crompton, secretary. These early organizers entered upon their work as those who had faith in the result.

The constitution provides that the association shall be called the Anti-secret Association of Iowa, and places it auxiliary to the N. C. A. The second convention met at Clear Lake, June 29, 1875. Here we meet the name of Rev. M. S. Drury, who was chosen president of the association for the year.

One of the speakers at that convention was the Rev. J. L. Bookwalter.

John Dorcas became the treasurer of the Association last year.

The next annual meeting was held at Western, April 25, 1876. At this convention met the names of Pres. E. B. Kephert, and Rev. T. J. Bauder, of Muscatine. One name, familiar to all the workers along the line of this reform, is that of A. D. May. Here, too, we meet the name, Moses Varney.

The U. P. church of Oskaloosa next received the convention, and April 24, 1877, was the time; Rev. R. A. McAyeal, pastor. Rev. J. W. Baine, of Chicago, was a speaker at that convention. John Dorcas was a member of that convention. December 11, 1877, a convention was held in Washington. In this was the annual meeting. Here we find W. P. Johnston, W. C. Williamson, James Dawson, George Brokaw, R. P. McConoughy, J. P. Stoddard, and John Dorcas.

The secretary's pen fell into the hands of Rev. C. D. Trumbull, whose clear, beautiful penmanship graces every page which he traced. Dr. McDiill, then of Monmouth, was one of the speakers at that meeting.

West Branch entertained the convention, March 18, 1879. At this meeting D. P. Rathbun and S. C. Starry were present, the former working the degrees of Masonry. A. W. Hall was elected secretary, and continued to serve the Association in that capacity, until the end of the year 1884. Through all these years Brother Hall did faithful service, and fulfilled his work with such a degree of finished execution that we can read every word, and know exactly what was done by the convention. Some of the minutes of the succeeding years are not so well kept, but we will not reflect. October 12, 1880, the convention met in Birmingham; Aug. 30, 1881, at Marion; Aug. 27, 1882, at Winterset; in 1883, Aug. 28, at Albia; Aug. 26, 1884, at Washington. Here there occurs a break in the records, showing no minutes for the meetings of 1885 and 1886.

College Springs entertained the convention, Oct. 18, 1887; Dec. 18, 1888, it met at Sharon; Nov. 6, 1889, at Blanchard; Dec. 2, 1890, at Fairfield; Nov. 10, 1891, Crawfordsville.

I have hastened over those later years, not because there was nothing of interest, but because there was so much that I could not gather it all. During these years we have had the telling labors of Edmond Ronayne, the elder Stoddard, the elder and the younger Blanchards, Bishop Wright, and many others whose telling work did much to mould the sentiment of the people, and nerve them for the conflict. A great many times we have been told that the convention and this "Anti" work was doing great good to the cause of Masonry and Odd-fellowship.

Speaking for a place that I know, I can say that, after a convention, and an exposition, and a few lectures, both the Odd-fellows and Masons surrendered their charters, and closed up their lodges. I saw some of the muslin robes and masks used by the "goats" in their sports, and—dreadful to tell!—the skeletons lie unburied, packed in a box, and stuffed away in a corner; but the unhallowed eyes of the uninitiate gaze upon these solemn relics of past terror, and these hands, that have not been lifted up in solemn oath or pledge to these things, have actually handled them. But the most touching of all things is this: When we came to look at these awe-inspiring remains of some noble specimen of the reign of darkness in the past—these bones that remain—and all that remain to tell the story of his past valor and glory; when we come to look minutely at the skeleton—it is all a sham—a made skeleton; and the material is the same with which many a designing farmer's wife has deceived the hens into laying good eggs beside ready-made nest-eggs—the nest-eggs and this skeleton was made of plaster-of-paris! How aptly these lodges often illustrate the depth of their own deception. It's sham from first to last.

Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship died in Morning Sun. I am sorry to say that secretism did not perish with them. For a while there was not a lodge of any kind in the village.

Under the leadership of a minister of the Gospel, a G. A. R. post was organized, and, since that, some other of the smaller fry have found a place in which to nurse a very pale and sickly child of secretism; but the clans do not find either a healthful atmosphere, or a rich soil there. But I must introduce the next topic.

II. WHAT ARE OUR PROSPECTS?

I shall be very brief here. If we are to look into the future—God's glad future which he has in store for his people here on earth—I can promise you that the day is coming when the lodge system shall be laid away beside the system of slavery and other relics of the dark ages. But it will not be without a contest. Slavery went down in blood. It was a beastly system. It had been steeped in blood, and only blood could wash it out.

In the lodge system, we have a system of slavery, but it enslaves the mind, the soul. It is doomed, too, and in a struggle. But the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty to the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan. Our duty is to turn on the light. We shall overcome, but it is by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of our testimony.

I have no special methods to recommend. Support the laborers in the field, and hold up their hands. Scatter the truth by all proper means. Look to the work, especially, of disseminating literature. We have our leaders, Gault, Paden, the Cynosure, and the Free Press. Let them lead; we shall follow.

THE HIGHBINDERS IN CALIFORNIA.

Despite the fact that the Chinese Consul-General issued a proclamation warning all his countrymen to cease the feud that has broken out, Chinatown was alive to-day with heavily-armed Highbinders, and there would have been a battle but for the vigilance of the police. Extra officers in citizens' dress patrolled the leading haunts of the Highbinders, and were rewarded by the capture of four men. The officers noticed a big crowd in front of the On Yeck headquarters in Washington street, and dashing in, the celestials scattered. Several ran into the headquarters and barred a heavy door. This was broken down, when four Chinese were captured, each wearing a chain coat of mail that will turn any bullet, and armed with big pistols. In a neighboring alley, before the So Yup headquarters, a Highbinder was arrested who wore a paper shirt that was bullet proof, and who was armed with pistol and knife. The Highbinders were evidently overawed by the police activity, but the old detectives declare that nothing can prevent more murders. There is a romance connected with the case of Chin Gow Ping, the Chinese who was shot Friday. Chin was one-eyed and ugly, but he had a wife who was young and pretty. The Highbinder society, of which Wong Quong Get, Chin's murderer, is a member, cast longing eyes on Chin's wife; and finally Wong stole her and took her to Los Angeles, where he sold her for $2,500. Wong afterward tried to convince Chin that his wife had left him voluntarily and to induce him to get a divorce, as he had been married in American fashion. Chin refused to do this, and then Wong caused proceedings to be brought in the wife's name against Chin for divorce. The suit was tried before Judge Troutt a few months ago, and Chin fought the case and won. Chin's friends say that he was murdered to prevent him from taking further steps to recover his wife.—San Francisco Dispatch, Nov. 20.

"STRIKES AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS."

At a social meeting of the "Sunset Club," in Chicago, several nights ago, was discussed the features of the Homestead strike, the blame being attributed both to the capitalists and the strikers by various speakers. Z. S. Holbrook, who had visited Homestead during the strike, spoke from his own observation in support of the company and in denunciation of the conduct of the strikers. George Schilling, John Coyle, a Homestead man, and Senator Peffer, of Kansas, were the principal speakers on behalf of the strikers and labor organizations generally.

This whole subject may be simply stated as involving the question whether the present condition of things, which recognizes, theoretically at least, the right of the individual to the control of his own labor and the legitimate results thereof, be they little or great, is to be maintained, or whether it is to give way to socialism, in which the individual and the better part of his individuality is lost in organization. Socialistic schemes have been the creation and hope of dreamers for thousands of years, but they are no nearer a successful realization now than they were in Plato's or More's time, and the reason is to be found in this one feature of all such schemes, they deny man's individuality in the control of his powers. Could they be fully and generally carried into effect the race would rapidly deteriorate in mental and physical characteristics, and progress in any direction would cease, for the one simple reason that all stimulus to extra exertion, either mental or physical, is taken away. This is not only the logical result of a study of human characteristics, but it has been repeatedly demonstrated in the history of communistic societies. Labor organizations, good in themselves when held strictly to their proper work, tend directly to the destruction of the individual—he becomes but a component part of a machine driven by some dominant spirit or by a committee, without the power, fully, to control his own labor or to determine for what price he shall work or refuse to work. If he asserts his individual freedom he does it at his physical and financial peril. The liberty of every workman who refuses to join such an organization is in peril by these organizations, for while they demand for themselves the right to determine for what wages their members shall work or not work, they deny, practically at least, that same right to all outside of the order. There never was a greater despotism than this. But it does not stop here—it extends to the employer and assumes the right to dictate how he shall conduct his business, upon pain of having it ruined if he resists. Its logical sequence is the denial of individual independence not alone, but all individual right and control of property; in short, socialism, and then anarchy. While the unions claim the largest kind of liberty for themselves, they deny to all outside of them that liberty. They say that they must have work and certain wages to live, but no one not of their number is allowed the same privilege. No system of labor based upon such an idea can live in this country, and the sooner the fact is recognized the better.—Chicago Evening Journal, Nov. 18.

FRATERNITY TROUBLES IN AN IOWA COLLEGE.

The Faculty of the Iowa State Agricultural College has a lawsuit on its hands, all on account of their efforts to suppress the Delta Tau Delta society, one of the Greek fraternities organized within the college. The action grows out of the expulsion of Orris W. Roberts and Charles Van Epps, two students of the college who would not, at the command of President Beardshear, withdraw their membership from the Delta Tau Delta society. Roberts hails from Harrison county; and not willing to sever his connection with either the fraternity or the college, began legal proceedings to determine whether the Faculty and the trustees have the legal right to do as they have done. Roberts' first intention was to apply to the courts for a writ of reinstatement, but as the school year has about expired, and as a decision could not be reached before the end of the term, that plan was abandoned and it was decided to begin an action at law to test the rights of the students of the college as well as the power of the Faculty and trustees over the students in cases where their relations with the fraternities are involved.

The principal question to be passed upon by the court is whether in an institution maintained by public taxation, as the State Agricultural College is maintained, the right exists to make rules and regulations which practically amount to a discrimination between citizens. It is claimed that the fraternity has nothing to do with the college, that it is a separate and distinct affair, that it holds its meetings off the college grounds and outside of college hours, and that in no way interferes with the studies of the students or with their moral welfare. It will, of course, be incumbent upon President Beardshear to show the minds of the students are attracted away from their studies by their relations with the Delta Tau Delta society, and this will be no easy thing to do, for Roberts stands at the head of his class and his deportment in and out of school hours has been of the very highest order.

The courts of the State have never had a case of this kind to deal with before; hence so far as the jurisprudence of Iowa is concerned the point raised is a new one. But cases involving almost similar points have been decided elsewhere. The opposition to the fraternity system has shown itself among college officers in the enactment of law rules in two forms. The first is a regulation of the Faculty that no society shall be organized among the students without their consent. By withholding their consent they permanently prevent the legitimate formation of chapters. The second is a pledge submitted to the student at matriculation, which they are required to sign as a condition precedent to becoming students and in which they promise to have no connection with a Greek-letter fraternity during their college career. The latter form is the most usual method employed. Such a pledge is enforced at Princeton, and was used until recently at Perdue University, Denison University and many others, while the former course was formerly in use at the universities of Alabama, North Carolina and Illinois.

The Delta Tau Delta fraternity was organized in the Iowa Agricultural College in 1875, and its existence has continued uninterruptedly down to the present time. It has enjoyed a membership during its lifetime of 124 students; and in the society now there are said to be fifteen students at present attending the college, embraced within its active membership. Probably the others would have been expelled with Roberts and Van Epps if their identity had been known to President Beardshear. The case will be argued before Judge Stevens of the Story County District Court some time this week. Eminent counsel have been retained by both the dismissed students and President Beardshear, so that an exhaustive legal battle may be expected. The case will not be without interest to all members of the fraternities throughout the country who number considerably over 110,000.—Des Moines Dispatch.

MAFIA IN THE UNITED STATES.

When Antonio Flaccomio was mysteriously murdered in front of the Cooper Union a few years ago, Superintendent Byrnes, then in charge of the detective bureau, made the discovery that a foreign secret assassinating society known as the Mafia had agents in this city and country, and that the order was flourishing in several of the cities of the United States. The assassination was laid at its door, but its members are so secretly banded together that the murderers have never been brought to justice.

Now it is known that branches of the secret order are very strong in New York, Boston, Providence, Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities. It is also known that the Mafia is responsible for a number of mysterious murders that have been committed in this country in recent years. A marked victim has asked for protection at police headquarters from agents of the order who are sworn to kill him. The man is Marzio Gindice, an intelligent Italian.

Gindice asserts that his wife, who died a year and a half ago, was robbed and poisoned by agents of the Mafia and her body stolen from the grave. His wife left property in Italy, he says, and in order to gain possession of this the Mafia is seeking his life and that of his 11-year-old son.

This is not the only reason he gives, however, for the Mafia wanting to murder him. In 1860 a murder was committed in the parish where his parents lived. His father was a wealthy nobleman, against whom the lower and criminal classes had a great hatred. To save the real murderer, his father was arrested and thrown into prison, where he was kept for three years, being released only upon his paying a large sum of money. Several Italians identified with the Mafia bore a grudge against the elder Gindice, which has been transferred to the son.

Marzio came to this country in 1867, and, after studying pharmacy for three years, he gave up his studies and went into business here, making balloons and selling flowers. He traveled all over the country attending fairs, where he sold the articles he manufactured. He says he has been hounded now for several years and threatened with death, and has gone from one place to another to escape assassination. Since the death of his wife the agents sworn to kill him have been on his track more persistently than ever.

Francisco Mortorelli, an Italian bandit, sent three men here to kill him, he says, a few years ago. The men he names are Augustino Mortorelli, Francisco's brother, Rigo Gindice, Marzio's own stepbrother, and a third man whose name he does not know. Augustino Mortorelli, he says, is at the head of the Brooklyn branch of the Mafia.

Marzio formerly lived in Brooklyn, and it was there that his wife died last year after an illness of fifteen days. The Mafia, he said, tried to palm off one of their members as a doctor, but he discovered the fraud. Shortly before his wife died an Italian priest came to the house and ordered every one out of the room. He alleges that the priest induced the dying woman to give him $500, which he said he would send to her brother, Antonio Buone, a soldier in the Italian army. When his wife died her body turned a reddish hue, but the attending physician gave a certificate from death from pneumonia. She was buried in the Holy Cross Cemetery in Brooklyn, but a few weeks after the interment the body was stolen.

About three months ago, he says, he made up his mind to go to Italy to get possession of his wife's property. His enemies got word of it and tried to get him to go in company with a young man who, Gindice says, he has since learned was one of the Mafia and who was to murder him at the first opportunity. Gindice is trying to get enough money to get back to Italy, but he fears he will be murdered before he gets away. He was told that the police would do everything in their power to protect him. The case is being investigated by detectives.—New York Dispatch, Nov. 18.

IN CHICAGO.

The police have been called upon to investigate the mysterious disappearance of Veneno de Lenno, who has been missing from his usual haunts since November 11, and who it is feared has met with foul play.

De Lenno is a fine-looking, middle-aged Italian, and was quite a prominent man among the more conservative members of the Italian quarter of this city. Owing to his long residence in Chicago he had become thoroughly Americanized, and in consequence of this fact was very unpopular with the "red" element. During the Mafia troubles in New Orleans about a year ago, De Lenno was very pronounced in his denunciation of that organization, and he at once became the object of the most bitter hatred of the Mafia sympathizers in this city. Protected by the esteem of the better class of his fellow countrymen, however, no attempt was made to wreak vengeance upon him, but his present disappearance is put down by his many friends as directly due to the workings of the society of assassins.

Lorense Audera, proprietor of a grocery store at 416 Clark street, at which place the missing Lenno was last seen, and who is known to be a staunch friend of the latter, said this morning at, in his opinion, Lenno had met with some misfortune.

"Do you think the Mafia has done away with him?" was asked.

"That is more than I can tell," said he, it being quite evident, however, that the grocer had no opinion of his own on the subject, but lacked the courage of his convictions.

The police are making every effort in the case, and if the dread Mafia is really at work in Chicago, the fact will be known before many days.—Chicago Evening Journal, November 19.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The story of a rocking chair.—Will Boston go no-license? Mr. Faxon's attitude.—An unnoted martyr.—A singular death.—Medford's candidate for mayor.

How many people realize that the rocking chair is comparatively a modern and essentially an American institution? "Can it be possible," I heard, incredulously, a friend of the writer, on the occasion when Lady Henry Somerset was present with one by her American admirers, "that an article of furniture which we consider a necessity in every household, which is common alike to the kitchen and parlor, cottage and mansion, should be practically unknown to our transatlantic cousins?" I am assured by an English acquaintance that this is a veritable fact. What would American women do after a hard forenoon on their feet without that soothing anodyne for tired nerves and aching muscles—our cosy rocker? Perhaps the true-born Briton cares more for dignity than less for comfort, or it may be only the insular John Bull prejudice against adopting new ideas; but, however that may be, Queen Victoria, good as possible soul, believes in rocking chairs to the extent of having them in all the royal residences, and it is certainly strange that a fashion thus set by the sovereign herself has not spread. My English friend told me a story on this point which I have never been in print and may amuse the Cynosure readers. When about to visit one of her subjects, some high official of the Queen's household always goes before to see that everything is in readiness for her Majesty; and on one such occasion the family whom she was going to honor on a two-days' visit were thrown into consternation by the announcement from this functionary that all their appointments were perfect, lacking only one thing, and that an absolute necessity—a rocking chair. "Ah, then there was hurrying and fro," for such an article could not be procured on short notice. After rummaging the village, however, one was at last found in a farmhouse kitchen—a plain wooden rocker, of the most homely and domestic type—but in that chair, and on other, the imperial grand-daughter of Farmer George sat all the time of her stay.

I wonder what kind of a Columbus celebration we shall have in 1992. Will it be, as the Boston Herald, which, like its rival the Globe, is always on its knees to Rome, declares the one just past to have been:—"strictly Roman Catholic, effusively patriotic, and intensely American?" The Herald readers who are so green as to really believe that anything can "be strictly Roman Catholic" and "intensely American" at the same time, ought to be disfranchised till they learn what "American" really means. Perhaps even the Herald may, in a day or two, feel that it has been rather premature in its statement that "Pilgrims and Puritans" have permanently retired, for the women voters are registering in larger numbers than ever before, and it is in them that the Puritan spirit seems now to have taken refuge. A greater surprise than the election of Cleveland would be the breaking up of Boston's citizens, some morning, and sending them under a no-license regime. Yet this may possibly be, for no-license has made great strides within a year or two, and there are indications that from various causes it will be much larger this year. What adds to the novelty, as well as the uncertainty, of the situation is, that many Democrats will vote for prohibition, to punish the liquor-sellers to whose defection they attribute the falling-off in the city's vote for Russell; while many temperance men will vote for license, on the ground that a prohibition victory gained under such circumstances will be worse than a defeat; for, of course, nobody supposes that the Democratic party "machine" intends that the change shall be permanent. They are willing to let Boston go dry for one year, but it is on the supposition that the enforcement of the law will be such a farce that rum will score a more sweeping triumph than ever at the next municipal election.

This is the position taken by Mr. Faxon. In a recent letter to Mrs. Fessenden, the W. C. T. U. State President, inclosing his check for $1,000, he "advised that no part of it be used in Boston," but to "try to convert the other cities and towns to the no-license policy, and thus drive all the drunkards and criminals into Boston," in the hope that the instinct of self-preservation will arouse her inhabitants to such a realization of their danger from the traffic that they will work out their own salvation. This is a strange position indeed for one of the foremost advocates of the temperance cause to occupy, and neither wise nor Christian. For years Boston has been the plague-spot of the Commonwealth, rendering null, to a large extent, the labors of temperance workers in "the other cities and towns" where Mr. Faxon advises them to concentrate their efforts. Perhaps he is right and, "at this time, a No vote is inexpedient for Boston;" but, at best, this is a very weak standing-place for a professed reformer. The witty saying of the poor old woman, when a mischievous boy for a lark tumbled some loaves of bread down the chimney, that, "the Lord sent it if the devil brought it," is very applicable to the present situation. The duty of temperance people is not affected in the least, even if liquor-men, for purposes of their own, stand side by side with them at the polls and cast the no-license ballot. Their duty is plain before them;—to vote down the abominable traffic in Boston or anywhere else, if the heavens fall. Expediency has nothing to do with it. The consequences, whatever they may be, even Mr. Henry Faxon is not called upon to shoulder. The Lord is abundantly able to take care of them.

Was there ever an age when the cause of righteousness did not have its martyrs? A temperance chalk-talker, writing from Maine to the Traveller about the various shifts that are resorted to in that State, and especially in Portland, to evade the liquor laws, relates the case of a man in the latter city who had his window sills made with a movable finish, and kept his supply of liquor inside. Because his daughter refused to tend the bar for him, her portion at his hand was brutal kicks and cuffs, until he finally broke her hip; and then when she informed the police of his violation of the law he turned her out of doors. Death soon ended her sufferings, and another soul under the altar cries for vengeance against this damnable traffic. How can Christian men vote for license, high or low, and not feel that the blood of this poor girl, and of other patient sufferers like her, is on their garments?

Students of English history remember how the Duke of Clarence, when given his choice of deaths, asked to be drowned in a butt of Malmsey wine. But if he had chosen, instead, to be thrown into an empty rum vat, he might have had a more expeditious death, as was proved by the experience of an employe in an East Cambridge distillery the other day, when he accidentally fell into one, and was killed almost immediately by the poisonous fumes.

The new city of Medford, by the way, is stirred up over the question, whether the head and proprietor of her famous distilleries, Gen. Lawrence, shall be her first mayor. The Lawrence family occupy, by virtue of their wealth, a high social position; and they are very religious; that is to say, they own pews in three of the leading churches, including the Congregational, and contribute largely to the support of the several societies with which they are connected. Without doubt Gen. Lawrence has given many handsome sums to missions, while his distilleries were turning out liquid poison by the shipload to debauch the poor savages on the Congo. But, in spite of this, there are some people, even in Medford, who feel that their new city will suffer an indelible disgrace if they put a rumseller, on the most colossal, scale at its head. But is there anything like politics (with Christianity left out) for evolving queer and huge contradictions? Men prominent in religious circles, men who have been earnest advocates for no-license, are supporting the candidacy of the Medford distiller. The reason is not far to seek. The glitter of his gold has blinded them to any higher consideration. They covet the munificent gifts to their newly-fledged municipality which he has it in his power to bestow in return for the honor. But "woe to him that buildeth a town by blood, and establisheth a city by iniquity!"

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23, 1892.

Where can one turn to escape the constant sight of the blighting work of the alcoholic fiend? It confronts us on all sides and in every direction, notwithstanding the vigorous and incessant warfare an ever-increasing army of good men and women are waging upon it. As long as the law recognizes it and the government receives money from it, the liquor traffic will remain one of the most dangerous foes our country has, and will only be kept within bounds by the work of vigilant folks who devote their time and talents to fighting it. This may be strong language, but it is true; and I have just witnessed a heart-rending scene which certainly justifies it use. Walking along one of Washington's principal business streets, my attention was attracted to a crowd in a side street, and I naturally went towards the crowd to see what had drawn it together. Pushing my way through, I saw a policeman standing in front of a neat two-story and basement home, while upon the wide parking between the house and the sidewalk, which is such a pleasant feature of our residence streets, was carelessly piled the household furniture which was being rapidly brought out of the house by several stalwart men. Near the policeman stood a shabbily-dressed woman, wringing her hands, while big tears coursed down her cheeks, and clinging to her skirts were two small children who appeared very much frightened and who were also crying. I asked the policeman what the trouble was. "The constable is executing an eviction writ; and much against my wishes my duty compels me to be here to see that it be peaceably done," he replied in a low voice, looking sympathetically towards the woman. I then asked the poor, wretched-looking woman whether she had a shelter for herself and little ones, and she told me that a friend had secured a place for her and was then gone to procure wagons to move the furniture from the street. Then assuring her that it was kindly meant, I ventured to ask why she was in such a disagreeable plight. "Whisky," she replied bitterly; "before my husband took to drink he was good and kind to the children and to me; he clothed and fed us well, and we always had a little money on hand for contingencies and never had any trouble with our landlords, because the money for our rent was always ready when our rent was due. Now that he is owned, body, and soul, too, I fear, by the whisky-sellers, he has lost all sense of honor and makes promises only to break them; that is why we are set out on the street by the constable." It was the first time I ever witnessed an eviction; God grant it be the last; but the constable assured me that they were occurring almost every day, and that in ninety-nine per cent of them whisky was the cause. Now let the reader say whether any language can be too strong to use in speaking of the traffic which causes all this misery to innocent mothers and children.

There are to-day, in Washington, nearly or quite 1,000 bar-rooms openly doing business without a license, to say nothing of the "speak eases," as the dens where liquor is sold on the sly are called. Every liquor license that was issued last year expired at midnight on the last day of October, and now, twenty-three days afterward, not a single license has been issued, although the applicants for licenses are all doing business. Why this delay on the part of the authorities? That is just what the people of Washington would like to know. The temperance workers have shown that, according to the explicit agreement under which they received their licenses last year, about 400, or nearly one-half of the applicants, have forfeited their right to receive licenses, and, rightly or wrongly, the suspicion is gaining ground that the delay in acting upon application for licenses by the authorities has a connection with the cases of these 400 rumsellers who, during the last license year, violated the law.

The headquarters of the Central Union Mission is a very busy place to-day. Its members have a list of 400 families who are to be furnished a bountiful Thanksgiving dinner, and the materials for those 400 dinners, which are generously donated by the public at large, are being received and prepared. In addition to these dinners sent to deserving families, a Thanksgiving dinner is served to the homeless at the mission building.

Secretary Tracy has approved Lieutenant Peary's application for three years' leave of absence, at the urgent request of the Geographical Society, which is to send him upon another Arctic expedition, although at first he declined to do so. His change of mind was brought about when he was shown that the proposed expedition has a more practical and definite object than the usual chimerical search for the North Pole. The object of the society in sending Lieutenant Peary to the Arctic regions again is to obtain the exact coast lines of Greenland, for geographical purposes, and such other information as he can concerning the climatic and topographical conditions of that little-known country. *

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE EASTERN AGENT.

READING, Pa., Nov. 23, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—So far as I can learn, no agent of our Association has visited this part of Pennsylvania. I find here a very needy field, and a goodly number who are willing to stand by the truth as opposed to the errors of the lodge.

This city has a population of seventy thousand, with over two hundred secret societies and brotherhoods. The people are largely of Pennsylvania German descent. The Lutheran and Reformed churches appear to be the most numerous among the Protestants. The Catholic church has a very strong hold, especially among the foreign element. Bishop Ryan was here last Sabbath. In honor of his coming, the Catholics turned out with a great parade, and had fireworks; so the papers announced.

I find no opening for lectures in the larger and more popular churches; but the few who seek Christ's glory, instead of their own, have opened their homes and houses of worship, and made me welcome.

The United Brethren have several churches here, but I find them under the control of what is known as the "liberal" element. The devil is always on the liberal side. When Christ was here Satan purposed to form a joint-stock company with him, Christ to put in his honor and glory, and Satan the kingdoms of the world. When Christian churches compromise principle for the sake of getting numbers, the devil gets the whole thing. I talked with U. B. ministers at the General Conference, at York, where the division occurred, and some of the so-called liberal ones reasoned that they were as much opposed to secret societies as they had ever been; but they thought a distinction should be made between the major and minor secret societies. While they did not approve of receiving Masons into their churches, they felt that the little brotherhoods should be tolerated. I replied that when they opened the church door to receive the minor orders they closed it to a discussion of the major. They replied, "No, we will still testify against Masonry and the more corrupt secret societies."

I find that my prediction has come true. There is not a U. B. church in this city that dares open its doors to a discussion of Masonry. The compromise with the powers of darkness has proved disastrous to the advocacy of the truth here, as it always will. The only safe ground for the Christian church is to avoid the very appearance of evil.

En-route for this city, I stopped for a few days in Philadelphia. I expect to stop on my return, next week, and fill an appointment with the Swedish Congregational church. The pastor of this church spoke of meeting our Secretary Kellogg at their ministerial meeting in Rockford, Ill. He will gladly do what he can to further the cause.

I have spoken four times in this city, and have an appointment to give a parlor talk at the home of Bro. C. Koffman, West Reading, to-night. Bro. Moyer, pastor of the Mennonite church, was about leaving home to hold a protracted meeting in the country, when I called. He replied at once that I was welcome to speak in his church on Sunday evening, and that he would do what he could to get the people to attend. When I reached the church in the evening, I found the young people in the midst of their testimony meeting. There were many exclamations of praise to God for salvation and deliverance from the bondage of sin. When it came time for me to speak I found before me a audience of over two hundred. Three-fourths of them were young men and women under thirty years of age. I felt it a great privilege to warn so many of those just entering life's real conflict against the trap set by the devil for them in the secret lodge system, and God blessed me in the presentation of his truth, and I felt good was accomplished. My remarks were followed by Bro. Rhoads, the brother who had preached in the morning. He told how, previous to his conversion, he had belonged to three secret societies, but God for Christ's sake had forgiven his sins and he could not longer yoke himself with the unbelievers of the lodge. He will, I trust, write out his experience for publication in the Cynosure.

Bro. Thos. J. J. Wright, pastor of Calvary Mission, cared for my temporal wants and welcomed me to address his people. The announcement that I would speak in the Mission on Monday evening, after the preaching service on Sabbath morning, brought out a good number. When I spoke of stopping, many said, "Go on;" so I spoke for over two hours. There are several in this Mission who testify of God's power to save from the unhallowed association of the lodges, as well as other sins.

Last night's meeting, at North Reading, was not so largely attended. One Mason, at least, was present. Bro. Austin, who is conducting the Mission in which I spoke, finds it a difficult field; but God has already rewarded his efforts in the salvation of some souls, and he is looking for larger results.

This morning I bought a German book which I cannot read. It is highly recommended as giving the facts in opposition to the lodge in an entertaining way, after the style of our books, "Holden with Cords" or "In the Coils." Many will read a story and learn the truth who would not read the dry facts. This book is entitled "In the Net of the Lodge," and is written by Rev. J. Berner, pastor of Peace Evangelical church, Buffalo, N. Y. Those wishing to know more about it, will be sent a circular explaining (in German), if they will write to me at Washington, D. C. [See our review of this book on page 6 of the Cynosure for October 13, 1892.] —EDITOR.

I go (D. V.) on Friday to attend a holiness convention at West Conshohocken, Pa., and expect an opening there for work. I shall leave over a dozen weekly readers of our paper in this city as a result of this coming. Several have expressed a wish that an anti-secrecy convention be held here. It would doubtless be well-attended and do good. Yours in the work,

W. B. STODDARD.

THE OREGON DEPARTMENT OF THE N. C. A.

CANBY, Ore., November 18, 1892.

We are laying the foundation for a victorious work, by circulating a good variety of tracts; holding special meetings, definitely on the line of reform; using, pointedly, the Word of God against secrecy, especially Freemasonry—showing its unscriptural and profane oaths, and deistical religion. The truth presented against these abominations has stirred up opposition; yet we unflinchingly move right forward in the name of the Lord, with a good degree of victory. We do not doubt but that the Lord is in the lead of the whole movement, and that he will give us a continued victory, as it is his own cause.

Forty ministers' names are enrolled under the head of our constitution—over 400 in all; and our numbers are still increasing. We are negotiating for Rev. J. P. Stoddard to take charge, as agent for the Oregon and Washington department. If no preventing providence, I think he will be on the work soon with his wife. We are aiming to secure their services for three years. They will be assisted by some able ministers scattered over their field of labor, both in Oregon and Washington. When they all are mustered into regular service, we will have quite an army to begin with. We intend to work on the Gospel line, showing decidedly, from God's Word, that the pretended benevolence of the numerous secret societies is much more selfish than Scriptural; and their works of darkness and perpetual secrecy indicate evil deeds, as "men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." We intend that our meetings shall be the means of many sinners being converted to God, and a good revival in the church, proving thereby the saving power of the Gospel.

We intend to put in motion, by the grace of God, that which will prove to be a lasting reform work, such as has not been known in these ends of the earth. Brethren, let us be united in this very important work. Each one should seek much of the love of Christ, and his Spirit to guide into all truth. When Nehemiah undertook to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, he understood it to be a great and important work, with much opposition, and that he was inadequate for the

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE IOWA CONVENTION.

LETTERS RECEIVED FROM ABSENTEES.

COLLEGE SPRINGS, Iowa, Nov. 15, 1892.

DEAR BRO:—Your card in relation to the State Anti-secret Convention at Marengo is at hand. I am sorry that I am situated so that I cannot be with you. I am heartily in sympathy with the work of the Association, and would be glad to co-operate in every way in my power for the furtherance of the cause. I am, very truly,

W. T. MORFET, (Pastor U. P. Church.)

LENEX, Iowa, Nov. 14, 1892.

DEAR BRO:—I am with you, I trust, in spirit, and as I cannot attend in person I will say that I am in full sympathy with the object of the Association. Yours for the furtherance of the cause of Him who says "In secret have I said nothing,"

J. E. BLACK.

CLEARFIELD, Iowa, Nov. 14, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I am with you in interest and effort. I have been an anti-secretist in my convictions from childhood, and the longer I live, and the more I observe the tendencies of secret societies, the more I am confirmed in my belief that they are anti-Christian and soul-ruining, and need to be suppressed. May the Master be with you and bless you.

S. W. LORIMER,
(Pastor U. P. Church.)

KNOXVILLE, Iowa, Nov. 14, 1892.

DEAR SIR:—We bid you God-speed in the good work you have in hand. You are helpers in the work to which we are as a church committed.

My observation and experience during fifteen years as a pastor, has convinced me that we are doing people a service for which they ought to be thankful, when we keep or help to keep them out of secret societies. It is a saving to them in money, time, morals, and in manliness. No good cause is likely to be served, in the long run, by secrecy, and much will certainly be lost. The need of our time is for more open, brave and manly men. I hope that you may be able to do something towards increasing the supply. Very truly,

JOHN C. SCOTT.

OTTUMWA, Iowa, Nov. 7, 1892.

DEAR BRO:—What God upholds let us uphold, and what God condemns let us condemn. Nothing has more fully convinced me of the dangerous power of these secret societies than the statements so frequently made by professed Christians, that they would leave the church if the pastor said aught against those secret societies. God help us to cry aloud and spare not, until the curse—anti-Christ, that is an instrument in the devil's hands is eradicated, and wiped out of our land by the power of God.

I am with you, heart and hand, in war against secret orders of any description or anything else that has a tendency to trample the Bible standard of salvation in the dust. F. M. DEWEES.

REDDING, Iowa, Nov. 14, 1892.

DEAR BRO. GAULT:—I would like to attend this convention at Marengo, to hear and learn more on this important subject, to meet the brethren and look into the faces of the brave men and women who have the Christian courage openly and manfully to contend with this gigantic evil so prevalent in our land and all lands. Organized secrecy I regard as contrary to the genius of our government, and an enemy to our civil institutions; contrary to the spirit of Christianity, and the avowed enemy of the church of Christ. True, they profess to be friendly to the church, or, at least, not to interfere with church relations. But such professions amount to nothing, in my mind, but deception, to deceive the unwary, and entangle good men, to give these societies a name. I view the empire of secrecy as being but the empire of diabolism; I believe that all Christian men should avoid them and oppose them in every lawful and Christian way. I desire and pray for the success of all Christian efforts to unmask and destroy this empire. God bless you, brethren, in your work. May the Holy Ghost imbue each one of you for the work in this convention, direct all your deliberations, indite all your prayers, make all your conclusions, and write all your resolutions. May light from on high shine not only upon you in convention assembled, but shine also into these dark places, penetrate the deepest recesses of this dark empire, and expose their sin. May the Lord bless every brother and sister engaged in this great work for the Lord and crown their efforts with abundant fruit to his glory. You will find my prayer in Isaiah 64: 1, 2; and my words of encouragement spoken of God—Isaiah 41: 10-14.

DAVID INCHES,

KEOTA, Iowa, Nov. 15, 1892.

I had hoped to drive through to Marengo with two or three loads of friends of the cause; but one man had to go to Chicago; another to Des Moines, and I am prevented from coming by an unforeseen condition of affairs.

I hope the cause of anti-lodgism in Iowa may get upon an encouraging and prosperous working basis. If there could be an Associated Press of Reforms constituted, with a bureau of correspondence, I think the work could be greatly advanced by bringing new workers rapidly into the ranks. It is not for lack of a widespread conviction that lodges, oath-bound and foresworn, are a menace to civilization, a travesty upon justice, and a stream of corruption to the personal conscience, but, I think, it is the lack of a more widespread means of discussing the subject; so the desideratum seems to me to be an associated press of reforms, in which the monstrosities of oath-bound fraternities may be ventilated.

But enough of this. I did not mean to theorize so when I started to write.

The Lord bless you in the work.

CHAS. R. HUNT.

COLLEGE TRUSTEES AND FRATERNITIES.

CHICAGO, Nov. 21, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I see that the upholders of college fraternities sharply criticize the action of the authorities of the Chicago University for their rulings against the fraternity system, on the ground that "it is beneath the dignity of the trustees to interfere in so petty a matter." What are college trustees for? Why are they chosen?

Going on the supposition that a college catalogue is a correct statement of the policy of its authorities, we find that most colleges pursue the policy of giving a distinctively Christian education; of giving an education at the lowest possible cost per student; of encouraging literary societies; of encouraging athletic exercises when the latter are not detrimental to study; of treating each and every student in the same manner, and of keeping each student as far removed from temptation as possible. The trustees are appointed to carry out this policy as far as possible; that is to say, they are appointed to keep the Christian standard of the college at the top-notch. Fraternities are inimical to the highest Christian life.

Trustees are appointed to keep the expenses of a college low enough to admit every deserving student who desires an education. Fraternities invariably raise the expense of a college course, not alone to the members of the fraternity, but to every student in the college.

Trustees are appointed to encourage literary societies. Fraternities kill literary societies at once.

Trustees are appointed to see that athletic games flourish to a certain extent. Fraternities, according to that muscular Christian, Mr. Staggs, are injurious to athletics.

Trustees are appointed to see that every student meets with fair play. Fraternities, with their "fratres in facullate," always induce more or less favoritism.

Trustees are appointed to throw as many safeguards around the student as possible. Fraternities give great opportunities for misdoing—the greater, because they are secret.

Notwithstanding all this, we are told that "it is beneath the dignity of the trustees to interfere in so petty a matter." The true function of a trustee, then, is to sit on the platform at commencement exercises, and to deliver addresses at alumni reunions. "Chacun a son gout." Yours,
SIDNEY P. JOHNSTON.

LITERATURE.

SELECT NOTES: A Commentary on the Sunday-school Lessons for 1893—Explanatory, Illustrative, Doctrinal, and Practical: Suggestions to Teachers and Library References. By Rev. F. N. Peloubet, D. D., and M. A. Peloubet. One volume. Published by W. A. Wilde & Co., 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Price, $1.25.

Peloubet's Notes have become an established authority—a trustworthy standard as a lesson expositor. The studies for 1893 for the first six months are taken from the books of Ezra, Haggai, Zechariah, Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes, Malachi. The last six months, from the books of Acts, Romans, First and Second Corinthians, Ephesians, Colossians, First Peter, and Revelation. The volume contains Christmas, Easter, Temperance, and Missionary lessons; also Colored Maps, Chronologies, two full-page illustrations, together with numerous small maps and pictures drawn by Gallagher, Myrick, and Beal, illustrating the Bible text. As a lesson-helper it is designed to meet alike the needs of teachers and scholars.

BABYLON'S BABES. By the Editor of the India Watchman, Bombay. Chicago: Sold at the office of the Christian Cynosure, 221 West Madison street. Price, five cents.

This is a truthful, and therefore a powerful tract, of thirty-two pages, revealing a stirring tale of trouble arising from the sale of anti-Roman Catholic publications by the author. "The summer of 1892 witnessed a strange epidemic of papal anathemas in India. The public were surprised by a series of bitter articles, 'breathing out threatenings and slaughter' against the India Watchman. A long and faithful vassal of the Roman Pope opened the battle by a long and violent letter in the leading daily papers in Bombay. Editorials and correspondence followed in quick march."

The warfare, however, was not confined to newspapers. No legal action was taken. "The ranting, canting chorus of Jesuits, R. C. editors, Anglo-Romish bishop, et al, aroused the curiosity of the Bombay police. So a friendly officer in plain clothes called at the (Watchman) office, bought samples of all (books) then for sale on Romanism—over sixty rupees' worth—paid cash for all, then 'seized' them, and politely left." This was the beginning of sorrows; but it paved the way for an energetic, scathing exposure of "Babylon's Babes," or offspring of pagan-papal institutions—for India's native practices are quite as objectionable as those of the papacy; and this book faithfully unmask the horrors of both. It will repay a careful perusal.

SECRET SOCIETIES INCOMPATIBLE WITH CHRISTIANITY. By I. J. Rosenberger. Pp. 17. Published by the Brethren's Book and Tract Work, Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. Rosenberger is a lucid writer, and in this tract presents some of the strongest arguments against lodgery extant. Briefly and pointedly he discusses the religion of secret societies, showing that it is anti-Christian; that their principles and religion are at variance with the teachings of Christ and his apostles; that lodge principles and laws are disloyal both to the Gospel of Christ and to the law of the land; and that these societies promote a great waste of time and money. It is a forcible pamphlet.

The Missionary Review of the World for December is out with its usual quota of valuable articles for and about the missionary fields of the world. In the department of Literature of Missions are able contributions upon the following subjects: The True Forward Movement, or a Higher Standard of Consecration, by Arthur T. Pierson, Editor-in-Chief; The Place of Schools in Mission Work; The American Mission in Egypt; The Industrial Home for Boys; The Gospel Among the Jews; The Forerunners of Carey, Part II; The Status of Moslem Women According to the Teaching of the Quran; A Moslem Back-Fire; and Extracts and Translations from

The Review of Reviews for November maintains its character for variety and abundance of composite literature—all timely and of interest to the general reader. Where there is so much of excellence, it is difficult to discriminate impartially; but among the leading articles may be mentioned: The Socialist Congress; The German Army; Compulsory Voting; Young Women in Journalism; Mr. Gladstone's Vindication of Home Rule, and the Home Rule Bill; England's Foreign Policy Arraigned by Mr. Labouchere; Some German Statesmen; Census of Our Foreign Element; The Future of Our National Banking System; Sunday at the World's Fair; Education in the West, and Compulsory Education in the West. The Progress, Current Events, Review and other departments are ably filled. The curiosity of the number is the "Composite Photograph of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet," combining portraits of the seventeen members in one. The result is as pleasing as it is startling. The united wisdom and benevolence of all are manifest in this singular combination, and one can easily imagine the excellence of a government controlled by this one individual. Published at 13 Astor Place, New York City.

American Gardening for November has nearly a hundred timely topics under consideration. Besides the usual interesting departments of horticulture, and numerous monographs upon kindred subjects, the following illustrated articles are given: Two Members of the Ampelopsis Family; The Harlequin Cabbage Bug; The Cornell Cherry, or Dogwood; A Debutante for the Coming Winter; Trellis for Dewberries; Bits of Experience and Prophecy; Experiments in Forcing and Crossing Tomatoes; Sketches from Fern-Life; A Flower Priest of the Bogs and Marshes; Forcing Lettuce; Garden Exiles; Gardening for Fun; Grapes in Chautauqua; Grass of Parnassus; A Simple Insect Catcher; A Machine for Laying Drainage Pipe; Ornamental Board-Walk; Large Flowering Schubertia; Economical Sodding; Proposed New Spraying Machine; Taste and Tact in Arranging Ornamental Grounds (continued); A New Trades-Cantra, and The Two Gardens. The frontispiece is a charming view of the World's Fair Horticultural Building. A superior number. New York: The Rural Publishing Company.

The Defence is a new monthly journal, published by Albert Needham, 1330 Arch street, Philadelphia, "Set for the defence of the Gospel (Phil. 1: 17)." At the head of this new and laudable enterprise is the well-known and respected evangelist, Geo. C. Needham, assisted by Mrs. Needham, Profs. Moorhead and Stiffler, Dr. W. J. Erdman (formerly of Moody's church in Chicago), and Pastors A. C. Dixon and D. M. Stearns. Most of these are notable Bible students and teachers, and, moreover, safe ones. The November issue has papers on Scriptural subjects by each of them. Bible exposition and teaching will continuously be its mission. It is neatly printed upon heavy paper, and is furnished to subscribers for fifty cents a year.

The Memory Library is a small bi-monthly periodical, published by James P. Downs, Pittsburg and New York. The "Introductory Lecture" of a series of lessons in Law fills the number before us. The object is to correspond with all who desire to impress upon their memories the ruling principles in written and common law. The system is also applied to other branches of professional study. The publisher also issues a series of manuals of "Memory and Thought." His address is 243 Broadway, New York City.

Vick's Magazine for November opens with a pleasant article, illustrated (and continued from the previous number), on Flower Missions and their Work, with numerous other papers, hints and suggestions for the gardener and horticulturist, touching those things most likely to be of interest to them at this season. Published at Rochester, N. Y.

We have had frequent occasion to commend Chicago's pretty and instructive magazine for children, The Cup-Bearer, and the November issue strongly confirms us in the belief that it is a very desirable publication for any well-regulated household. Live boys and girls will be sure to appreciate it. Published at 358 Burling street, city.

The Century will begin a series of papers on notable women in the December number with one on Jenny Lind. A paper on the philanthropist Dorothy Dix, about whose wonderful life but little is known, will appear in the January number.

OBITUARY.

Christians in Waupun, Wis., have lost one of their number. Another has gone to swell the anthems of the redeemed in heaven. One more has left us, to be forever with the Lord.

BROTHER ELLIS WHITING

died in this city October 30, 1892. He received a stroke of paralysis the Thursday previous, from which he did not recover. He remained conscious for a while, but was unable to express his thoughts vocally. With the unparalyzed hand he pressed that of his dear wife many times, with a tenderness she will never forget. It expressed a love unchanging and undying; a sympathy none but a tender, loving companion could realize.

Bro. Whiting was born in Boston, N. Y., April 20, 1823. He became a Christian while young. More than fifty years he had been a devoted follower of Jesus. He was an exemplary Christian gentleman, respected and loved by all who loved righteousness, truth and light. For many years he was a deacon of the Freewill Baptist church of this place, a faithful, constant and persevering Christian. We shall never forget his meek, fervent prayers full of meaning and request, nor his faithfulness to be at his post if possible. If he and his companion were away from church we knew there was a consistent reason for it, but we always missed them.

He was a friend of the Cynosure, and in earnest sympathy with all its reforms, prizing it more highly than all other papers. He will be remembered by Bros. Stoddard, Hinman, Browne, Ames, and other reformers that have visited this place. For me to say that this manifested interest brought him no trouble would be false. It did. His brain for the last few years being affected, made him chafe under it more at times than others. His physician thought that if he were not trepanned it would terminate in softening of the brain. But God took him home while his capacity for business and devotion were unimpaired.

He visited friends at the East, as he anticipated, for the last time, and came back to us with a cheerful face and manner.

The morning of the day before he fell, he called on Bro. Moon, the pastor, made him a present of a horse, and then attended a sociable. He was feeling unusually well on the day that closed his conversation with friends here forever. He has passed on to join the company of several dear Christians of this place, who have gone from earth to heaven within a very few years.

The funeral services were held at his residence, the sermon being preached by Rev. Mr. Moon, assisted by Rev. O. H. True, of Fairwater.

The remains were taken to Buffalo, N. Y., for burial.

He has gone to his God—

To the great loving Father,
Who watched all his steps
With the tenderest care;
He has left his church here
For the great church united,
And Jesus and blessed ones
Do welcome him there.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1892.

Freemasonry is pagan in its origin, devilish in its principles, and hellish in its destiny.—REV. O. P. GIFFORD, of Immanuel Baptist Church, Chicago.

THE NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION.

A good deal of Christian interest centers about this notable gathering of the clans against the strongholds of the secret system. The program of the convention, printed on the first page of this issue of the Cynosure, will give some idea of the impetus which it is expected to give the work in New England.

In this connection we are pleased to present the views of Rev. J. M. Foster, of Boston, as embodied in a recent communication from him:

THE PLEDGE OF SECRECY.

Much criticism has been bestowed on the Cynosure and the National Christian Association because we have put ALL secret orders into the same general class, and declared opposition to all forms of organized secrecy. It is held that while there may be specific objections to Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship, and, perhaps, to some other orders, the evil is not in their secrecy; for it is said that the family is a secret association, and every individual is, and must be, a repository of secrets which he does not, and ought not, to reveal.

This is the position of the great majority of the members and defenders of the minor secret orders; and this is the position, also, taken by Dr. Talmage in his sermon on secret societies. We answer:

1. That all concealment is in its nature abnormal, and is the result of sin. If perfect holiness existed among men, there would be no need of concealments, since there would be nothing in the conduct of men but what would commend itself to all others. Because of sin, there is occasion for privacies, and concealment, sometimes, is a duty. But it is only a duty. The manifestation of the whole truth would not be helpful, and might be injurious to others. Thus the privacies of the family are maintained, not because of any pledge of concealment, but from a general sense of propriety; because no one has any interest in knowing them, except the family, and the general public would be injured rather than benefited by having them proclaimed. This is equally true of individual privacies; and as each person is to be the judge as to what he ought, or ought not, to tell to others, so each member of every family is under no other obligation of secrecy than the universal requirement to have due regard to the interests not only of his family, but to the general well-being of society. And since all families in a well-ordered society are essentially alike, there really are no secrets, for the privacies of one are common to all, and all the ordinary doings of all are open to the world. A strictly secret family does not exist, except in barbarous or criminal life.

The family is widely different from a secret society. It is an institution of divine appointment, and for sacred purposes. Secret orders are human institutions, for selfish purposes. In the family the ordinary doings are open; in the secret orders they are concealed. In the family the duty of concealment is entirely optional; in the secret orders it is held as absolute and unconditional. In the family it is not based on secrecy; the secret society is and must be secret, or it would not be a secret society.

2. But our objections to the pledge of secrecy are: That the promise is absolute and unconditional. The covenant to “always conceal, and never reveal,” is substantially the promise of all secret orders. It must be so; for if the concealment was optional, then it would not be a secret society.

Now the secret that is to be revealed may be something that the law of love requires that we should publish it to the world. This will be true, whether it be something that in its nature is either hurtful or beneficial. In either case we ought to tell it; and a failure to do so makes us subject to the denunciations of God's wrath; nor can we ever interpose a promise not to do God's will as an excuse for doing what he has forbidden; nor can any assurance that it is not contrary to the consciences of others be any excuse for us. It is our sense of right, as enlightened by the Spirit and the Word of God, that is to be our guide.

But since we cannot know beforehand what it is that we are required to conceal, it is therefore plain that no such promise ever ought to be made. But, as it is sometimes said, if such a promise of secrecy concerns matters which are manifestly indifferent, such as the signs and passwords of secret orders, and that they are assumed as a cover for something not intrinsically wrong, may we not then be justified in making the promise? We answer that we cannot know that these secrets are matters of indifference until we know what they are; and if it is conceded that they are merely a mask to conceal from the public eye certain things which are really beneficent, then the law of love requires that we shall abstain from taking any such covenant; because every beneficent institution can afford to be, and ought to be, made public.

It often happens that the uninitiated have a real interest in knowing the nature of the pledges made in these institutions, and of the character of the institutions themselves. Then the law of love requires that we shall tell our neighbor the real facts, without concealment or dissimulation. Suppose that a Christian desires to become a member of a secret order, provided there is nothing in it that is hurtful to his conscience, then such Christian has a right to ask of his Christian brother who is in possession of facts in the case to tell him what they are, so that he may judge, from his own standpoint, whether they are in harmony with his sense of duty to God and to man. It is very evident that a member of any secret order would be under a promise not to be perfectly frank and sincere—not to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, but rather to hold his covenant of secrecy to be more sacred than his obligation to his brother in Christ. But, since there can be no obligation higher than our duty to Christ and his disciples, it follows that there can be no obligation not to tell the truth, and that no such promise ought to be made.

Suppose, too, that a Christian man has discovered what purports to be secrets of one of these orders, and that, to him, such things are not in harmony with the principles of the Gospel of Christ. He goes to his brother in the household of faith—perhaps his pastor—and asks if these things are so. Surely he has a right to a truthful and candid answer. If his pastor knows, he is bound to tell him what are the facts, and to give him all that information that is necessary to his peace of mind and his knowledge of duty. Now it is plain that such a pastor, if he held his pledge of secrecy to be binding, could not tell him all the facts, but would be bound, rather, to dissimulate and put his brother on a false track. In other words, he would defend his order, at the expense of his duty to God. As a matter of fact, members of the secret orders do habitually dissimulate, pretending something to be false which they know to be true, and something else to be true which they are sure is false. Pres. Finney says that he was frequently asked if the Morgan exposition of Masonry was true, and that as he could not lie about it, he felt bound to say that it was true. He says, furthermore, that no man can be a true Mason without being a practical liar—at least, so far as Masonry is concerned. One thing is quite certain—that secret societies are schools of dissimulation.

While it is conceded that there is a difference in secret societies, just as there is a difference between false-swearing and hypocrisy, or between wine-drinking and the use of stronger intoxicants, there really is no difference in principle. As alcohol is common to all forms of intoxicating beverages, and as hypocrisy is common to all kinds of lying, so organized secrecy is the common factor in all these societies; and it is this alone which makes them sources of danger; for no society that is open to public observation will long be tolerated, unless its teachings are in harmony with the recognized laws of morality. It is only by secrecy that it is possible for any of these orders to be sources of danger. The evil, then, is in making secrecy the basis of organization; and every one who joins any kind of a secret order consents to, and practically endorses, the principle of organized secrecy, so that he practically consents to all other secret societies. He may disclaim all responsibility for certain things that are in such societies, but for the principle that made such things possible he is responsible.

PROTECTION.

The first duty of every civil government is the protection of its citizens in their natural rights. This was the primary object of our government, namely, “to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty.” It is no part of its duty to promote the interests of a class in distinction from the interests of the whole; to do this is to depart from its original purpose. Class legislation is always unjust, for all classes cannot be equally benefited; for the advantages that accrue to the one will be at the expense of the others.

Next to the suppression of crime, it is the duty of the government to promote public and private morals. Civil law cannot make men moral, in the highest sense of the word, for it cannot change the nature of men. Nothing but divine grace can do that. But law can make a life of outward morality easy, and one of immorality painful and difficult.

The promotion of general education, the protection and encouragement of Christian worship, and, above all, the suppression of any business that is destructive of morals, and which tends to promote crime, is a legitimate and most important object of civil law.

The history of our nation shows that we have quite largely failed to secure the primary object for which our government was instituted, and that we have gone out of the way in the promotion of special interests, which were maintained at the expense of the general good. The first seventy-three years of our national history, from 1789 to 1862, were devoted to the interests of human slavery. At the dictation of the slave-power, we carried on two wars—with the Seminoles in Florida and with Mexico. From 1820 to 1860, scarcely a measure passed the houses of Congress and received the consent of the President, but what was in the interest of slavery. After the administration of John Quincy Adams, no man could be elected to the office of President who did not promise most obsequious obedience to all of its demands.

In course of time, as was inevitable, this brought a reaction, which culminated in the great war and the overthrow of slavery. Since 1862 (influenced, in the first place, by the need of a vast revenue to meet war expenses), our national legislation has had special regard for the manufacturing, the moneyed, and the liquor interests, to the great neglect of personal rights and the general interests of morality. The Republican party did indeed pass a Civil Rights bill, designed to protect all citizens in their natural rights, but it was set aside by the courts and abandoned by the party that enacted it. Meantime, most monstrous crimes are constantly committed against the colored people of the South, and there is no redress, either in State or Federal courts, or in legislation. The Republican party did attempt to enact a Federal election law that was designed to save us as a nation from the monstrous inconsistency of offering the suffrage to the freedmen, and then looking on and seeing them utterly defrauded of it. But the act failed to pass a Congress that was Republican in both branches, and was then abandoned as a party measure.

But while our government has forgotten its primary object, it has not failed in its regard to special legislation. Protection, which ought to mean equal rights for all, has been used to juggle with. We have protected the manufacturers and the liquor interests, at the expense of the farming and laboring classes, and at the expense of public morals. After thirty years of trial, there is at best, a partial result. Now let us have real protection for all.

—Rev. M. A. Gault preached last Sabbath in Douglas Hall, in this city, where Rev. W. M. Howie's congregation is holding services with quite encouraging success. Bro. Howie is in full sympathy with the cause of anti-secrecy, and will arrange for a meeting in the hall at the first favorable opportunity.

—The comet that was thought to be Biela's, and proved to be another, unknown, and which was to closely approach our earth on Sunday last, gradually receded before attaining any threatening proximity, leaving the puzzled astronomers to bite their thumbs and acknowledge that some of the mysteries of the Lord's great universe are far beyond their finite comprehension.

—Rev. L. G. Jordan, formerly one of the lecturers in the Southern States for the N. C. A., is now the business manager of the Christian Banner, a fine-looking weekly newspaper published in Philadelphia, and devoted to home and general religious intelligence and family reading. Old readers of the Cynosure will be glad to hear that our former fellow-worker is so profitably employed.

—A late number of the Pacific, the Congregational paper of the Western Coast, prints a short poem on an incident in the life of John Dougall, founder of the New York Witness. Being asked by a pastor to print a notice of a church fair in the Witness, Mr. Dougall replied: "My dear sir! will you please go home and pray." One verse of the poem reads:

"You who to some 'order' bow,
All its binding oaths obey,
Either pay to God each vow,
Or else go home and pray."

This is advice worth heeding by all who enter the lodges.

—An attentive correspondent, an active evangelist engaged in mission work in this city, relates the following incident: "One of the seven thousand devil-worshippers of licensed saloon proprietors and drunkard-makers in Chicago, a former Sabbath-school scholar of mine, who had a godly mother, when spoken to yesterday... thrust upon me a Masonic medal, saying: 'I live up to that—I'm a man!' quoting Bishops Cheney and Fallows as his fellow-craftsmen." When the Christless lodge gets into the church, the devil may rightfully claim the ministers as his fellow-craftsmen. "Freemasonry," says high Masonic authority, "is not Christianity, nor even a substitute for it!"

—A new danger has recently arisen among the modern innovations of science—the production of odorless fuel gas, which within a month has caused the deaths of eight persons in the Hyde Park district of Chicago. On another occasion, an entire dancing-school narrowly escaped death, from the same source, in this city. It is stated on excellent authority, that the deaths referred to were not due to simple asphyxiation, but that the gas itself is poisonous, and therefore doubly dangerous to life. The fact that it is practically odorless is also an added menace, as its insidious work is accomplished before the victim is aware of the presence of the deadly fluid. It will be well to avoid the use of this fatal instrument of mortality.

—The publication office of the Cynosure—the "Carpenter Building," 221 West Madison street, Chicago, narrowly escaped destruction by fire, one evening last week, through the burning of two small wooden stables in the rear. The stables, with their contents and two horses, were consumed, but, providentially, the damage to the Carpenter building was small. The tenant of the ground floor suffered considerable loss in stock.

The fire was caused by an incendiary. One man (demented) has been arrested for the crime, but there are serious doubts as to his identity as the "fire bug." The lesson learned through this incident is to keep thoroughly insured. This the N. C. A. always does.

—During the recent dedicatory exercises of the World's Fair the Knights of Pythias were quite distressed and provoked because their lodges were put into the civic procession and not allowed to parade as military. They regard themselves as half-warriors, at least, and are quite ambitious to be counted among the bravest of the brave. One of their champions said through the daily press: "The high officers of the order, though accepting the decision of the committee as final, do not entertain the same enthusiastic view of the celebration as of yore, but may even be disposed to resent the order by refusing to take part in the parade." These are very public-spirited gentlemen, perhaps, but their titles and fustian have clearly turned their heads. What does the country—or the world—want of such a military body, anyhow?

REV. M. A. GAULT'S THANKSGIVING.

CHICAGO, Nov. 28, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Thanksgiving day was quite joyfully celebrated by wife and I, with father and mother, in the dear old home near Kossuth, Iowa. Our parents were in usual health, and around the hearth-stone all the boys were gathered once more. There was T. H., our lawyer brother from Chicago, and R. J., the pastor from Mansfield, Ohio, and J. B., the farmer brother at home. We had all met here a little more than a year before, on Nov. 2, when we celebrated father's and mother's golden wedding. Some sixty or more old friends and neighbors then met with us, and it was a meeting long to be remembered.

On this last Thanksgiving day I had the privilege of preaching to Bro. T. P. Robb's large congregation at Sharon, who as usual were well out. I richly enjoyed my visit at the parsonage with Bro. Robb and family, and my part in their good Thanksgiving dinner, though it was cut a little short by the whistle of my return train.

In the evening Bros. T. H. and R. J. Gault and I addressed a meeting in the interests of the anti-secret reform. It was held in the Swedish Lutheran church, near our old home, and was arranged by Matthew Peck, a class-leader in the M. E. church at Kossuth. There was a nice audience present, who listened with close attention. Bro. T. H. made some strong points against the lodge, gleaned from his practice in law. He said that the determining factor in the decision of a jury was not so much the pleading of the attorney as the number of members on the jury who could give the same sign. Bro. Peck and Bro. R. J. Gault made some good points for prohibition. The former said his father had been a Mason, but advised him, when he once proposed to join the lodge, not to do so. We were invited to hold more meetings here, and will do so at the earliest opportunity.

FROM M. N. BUTLER.

November 25, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—November 19th found me at the home of that grand reformer, Rev. Henry Selmler, the United Brethren evangelist, near Blockton, Ia. He and his family know how to care for and encourage those who are battling for Christianity and good government. Rev. Cyrus Smith, of DeKalb, aided us in the afternoon in sowing literature for miles. He is always at the front. A Bible reading was given at night.

In Redding I met Rev. Mr. Inches, J. T. Rothwell and other strong Americans.

Dropping down to Irene, Mo., a Bible reading was given at Honey Grove on Sabbath evening. Bro. Henry Fry, Rev. C. O. Peterson, Fred Rhinehart, Benjamin Drummonds, W. H. Goff, and many outspoken anti-secretists reside at this place.

Monday night a full house received "Masonic Religion" with enthusiasm at Pleasant Valley. Judge John West, Rev. Joshua Flora, and Zenas Wease spoke strongly in favor of Christianity and good government.

Tuesday, at 7 P. M., "Masonic Sun-Worship" was discussed at Lone Star, to a crowded audience, among whom were such friends as W. C. Sloan, J. E. Roudebush, two school teachers, Erastus Hills and Geo. Proctor.

Wednesday, at dark, a good crowd greeted "Masonry and the Rebellion" at Isadora, where Elder Hinman and I met the good people on this line a dozen years ago. That ever alert veteran, John Allee, ready and able in debate with the Hiramites, did become mine host, and his devoted wife and son Edward, with other strong friends, bade us God-speed. I. E. Potter, formerly a Mason, of Knox Co., Ill., attested the absolute correctness of the Masonic steps, dueguards, signs, passwords, rites and ceremonies as I rehearsed them to the deeply-interested listeners. The weather is beautiful and I expect a large hearing to-night. But more anon.

IOWA STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

Our former accounts of the State Convention of the Iowa Christian Association, at Marengo, Nov. 15 and 16, were incomplete, owing to the absence of the Reports of the Committees on Nominations, Resolutions, and Plan of Work. We have since received them from Secretary Robb, and herewith present them in full:

OFFICERS OF IOWA ASSOCIATION.

President: John Dorcas, Tipton, Iowa.
Vice Presidents: Rev. George Fry, Walker, Iowa; Rev. W. H. Coffee, Burlington, Iowa.
Secretary: Rev. T. P. Robb, Linton, Iowa.
Treasurer: Rev. L. Mendenhall, Fairfield, Iowa.

RESOLUTIONS.

WHEREAS, All secret societies are based on the un-Christian principle of perpetual secrecy, and on the military principle of unquestioning obedience; therefore,

1. Resolved, That we reiterate our testimony against all secret societies, whether major or minor.

2. Resolved, That we believe that every church should testify that membership in such societies is contrary to Christian principles.

PLAN OF WORK.

WHEREAS, Conventions in this cause are a most efficient means of uniting, organizing, and strengthening the movement, rallying the friends, and raising a public testimony in its behalf; therefore, we recommend to our agents in the field, wherever there is a sufficient constituency of friends of the cause, that they hold local conventions, and that they take especial pains to work up these conventions, by holding local meetings, enlisting pastors and the best local talent, comprising both old and young, male and female.

We also recommend that all friends of the cause, in their respective localities, make every possible effort to aid our agents in arranging for meetings, because the most difficult part of the agents' labor is to secure the opening of churches for lectures.

We also recommend that the Secretary make an effort to secure the co-operation, as far as possible, of every pastor and minister in the State. (1.) By mailing him a circular letter, asking the use of his pulpit at some seasonable time for presenting this reform to his congregation. (2.) In case of those pastors who are committed to this movement, we recommend that they be requested to furnish the addresses of heads of families to whom the Carradine Sermon, or other suitable anti-secrecy literature, may be sent.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1892.

Freemasonry is pagan in its origin, devilish in its principles, and hellish in its destiny.—REV. O. P. GIFFORD, of Immanuel Baptist Church, Chicago.

THE NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION.

A good deal of Christian interest centers about this notable gathering of the clans against the strongholds of the secret system. The program of the convention, printed on the first page of this issue of the Cynosure, will give some idea of the impetus which it is expected to give the work in New England.

In this connection we are pleased to present the views of Rev. J. M. Foster, of Boston, as embodied in a recent communication from him:

THE PLEDGE OF SECRECY.

Much criticism has been bestowed on the Cynosure and the National Christian Association because we have put ALL secret orders into the same general class, and declared opposition to all forms of organized secrecy. It is held that while there may be specific objections to Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship, and, perhaps, to some other orders, the evil is not in their secrecy; for it is said that the family is a secret association, and every individual is, and must be, a repository of secrets which he does not, and ought not, to reveal.

This is the position of the great majority of the members and defenders of the minor secret orders; and this is the position, also, taken by Dr. Talmage in his sermon on secret societies. We answer:

1. That all concealment is in its nature abnormal, and is the result of sin. If perfect holiness existed among men, there would be no need of concealments, since there would be nothing in the conduct of men but what would commend itself to all others. Because of sin, there is occasion for privacies, and concealment, sometimes, is a duty. But it is only a duty. The manifestation of the whole truth would not be helpful, and might be injurious to others. Thus the privacies of the family are maintained, not because of any pledge of concealment, but from a general sense of propriety; because no one has any interest in knowing them, except the family, and the general public would be injured rather than benefited by having them proclaimed. This is equally true of individual privacies; and as each person is to be the judge as to what he ought, or ought not, to tell to others, so each member of every family is under no other obligation of secrecy than the universal requirement to have due regard to the interests not only of his family, but to the general well-being of society. And since all families in a well-ordered society are essentially alike, there really are no secrets, for the privacies of one are common to all, and all the ordinary doings of all are open to the world. A strictly secret family does not exist, except in barbarous or criminal life.

The family is widely different from a secret society. It is an institution of divine appointment, and for sacred purposes. Secret orders are human institutions, for selfish purposes. In the family the ordinary doings are open; in the secret orders they are concealed. In the family the duty of concealment is entirely optional; in the secret orders it is held as absolute and unconditional. In the family it is not based on secrecy; the secret society is and must be secret, or it would not be a secret society.

2. But our objections to the pledge of secrecy are: That the promise is absolute and unconditional. The covenant to “always conceal, and never reveal,” is substantially the promise of all secret orders. It must be so; for if the concealment was optional, then it would not be a secret society.

Now the secret that is to be revealed may be something that the law of love requires that we should publish it to the world. This will be true, whether it be something that in its nature is either hurtful or beneficial. In either case we ought to tell it; and a failure to do so makes us subject to the denunciations of God’s wrath; nor can we ever interpose a promise not to do God’s will as an excuse for doing what he has forbidden; nor can any assurance that it is not contrary to the consciences of others be any excuse for us. It is our sense of right, as enlightened by the Spirit and the Word of God, that is to be our guide.

But since we cannot know beforehand what it is that we are required to conceal, it is therefore plain that no such promise ever ought to be made. But, as it is sometimes said, if such a promise of secrecy concerns matters which are manifestly indifferent, such as the signs and passwords of secret orders, and that they are assumed as a cover for something not intrinsically wrong, may we not then be justified in making the promise? We answer that we cannot know that these secrets are matters of indifference until we know what they are; and if it is conceded that they are merely a mask to conceal from the public eye certain things which are really beneficent, then the law of love requires that we shall abstain from taking any such covenant; because every beneficent institution can afford to be, and ought to be, made public.

It often happens that the uninitiated have a real interest in knowing the nature of the pledges made in these institutions, and of the character of the institutions themselves. Then the law of love requires that we shall tell our neighbor the real facts, without concealment or dissimulation. Suppose that a Christian desires to become a member of a secret order, provided there is nothing in it that is hurtful to his conscience, then such Christian has a right to ask of his Christian brother who is in possession of facts in the case to tell him what they are, so that he may judge, from his own standpoint, whether they are in harmony with his sense of duty to God and to man. It is very evident that a member of any secret order would be under a promise not to be perfectly frank and sincere—not to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, but rather to hold his covenant of secrecy to be more sacred than his obligation to his brother in Christ. But, since there can be no obligation higher than our duty to Christ and his disciples, it follows that there can be no obligation not to tell the truth, and that no such promise ought to be made.

Suppose, too, that a Christian man has discovered what purports to be secrets of one of these orders, and that, to him, such things are not in harmony with the principles of the Gospel of Christ. He goes to his brother in the household of faith—perhaps his pastor—and asks if these things are so. Surely he has a right to a truthful and candid answer. If his pastor knows, he is bound to tell him what are the facts, and to give him all that information that is necessary to his peace of mind and his knowledge of duty. Now it is plain that such a pastor, if he held his pledge of secrecy to be binding, could not tell him all the facts, but would be bound, rather, to dissimulate and put his brother on a false track. In other words, he would defend his order, at the expense of his duty to God. As a matter of fact, members of the secret orders do habitually dissimulate, pretending something to be false which they know to be true, and something else to be true which they are sure is false. Pres. Finney says that he was frequently asked if the Morgan exposition of Masonry was true, and that as he could not lie about it, he felt bound to say that it was true. He says, furthermore, that no man can be a true Mason without being a practical liar—at least, so far as Masonry is concerned. One thing is quite certain—that secret societies are schools of dissimulation.

While it is conceded that there is a difference in secret societies, just as there is a difference between false-swearing and hypocrisy, or between wine-drinking and the use of stronger intoxicants, there really is no difference in principle. As alcohol is common to all forms of intoxicating beverages, and as hypocrisy is common to all kinds of lying, so organized secrecy is the common factor in all these societies; and it is this alone which makes them sources of danger; for no society that is open to public observation will long be tolerated, unless its teachings are in harmony with the recognized laws of morality. It is only by secrecy that it is possible for any of these orders to be sources of danger. The evil, then, is in making secrecy the basis of organization; and every one who joins any kind of a secret order consents to, and practically endorses, the principle of organized secrecy, so that he practically consents to all other secret societies. He may disclaim all responsibility for certain things that are in such societies, but for the principle that made such things possible he is responsible.

PROTECTION.

The first duty of every civil government is the protection of its citizens in their natural rights. This was the primary object of our government, namely, “to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty.” It is no part of its duty to promote the interests of a class in distinction from the interests of the whole; to do this is to depart from its original purpose. Class legislation is always unjust, for all classes cannot be equally benefited; for the advantages that accrue to the one will be at the expense of the others.

Next to the suppression of crime, it is the duty of the government to promote public and private morals. Civil law cannot make men moral, in the highest sense of the word, for it cannot change the nature of men. Nothing but divine grace can do that. But law can make a life of outward morality easy, and one of immorality painful and difficult.

The promotion of general education, the protection and encouragement of Christian worship, and, above all, the suppression of any business that is destructive of morals, and which tends to promote crime, is a legitimate and most important object of civil law.

The history of our nation shows that we have quite largely failed to secure the primary object for which our government was instituted, and that we have gone out of the way in the promotion of special interests, which were maintained at the expense of the general good. The first seventy-three years of our national history, from 1789 to 1862, were devoted to the interests of human slavery. At the dictation of the slave-power, we carried on two wars—with the Seminoles in Florida and with Mexico. From 1820 to 1860, scarcely a measure passed the houses of Congress and received the consent of the President, but what was in the interest of slavery. After the administration of John Quincy Adams, no man could be elected to the office of President who did not promise most obsequious obedience to all of its demands.

In course of time, as was inevitable, this brought a reaction, which culminated in the great war and the overthrow of slavery. Since 1862 (influenced, in the first place, by the need of a vast revenue to meet war expenses), our national legislation has had special regard for the manufacturing, the moneyed, and the liquor interests, to the great neglect of personal rights and the general interests of morality. The Republican party did indeed pass a Civil Rights bill, designed to protect all citizens in their natural rights, but it was set aside by the courts and abandoned by the party that enacted it. Meantime, most monstrous crimes are constantly committed against the colored people of the South, and there is no redress, either in State or Federal courts, or in legislation. The Republican party did attempt to enact a Federal election law that was designed to save us as a nation from the monstrous in-sistency of offering the suffrage to the freedmen, and then looking on and seeing them utterly defrauded of it. But the act failed to pass a Congress that was Republican in both branches, and was then abandoned as a party measure.

But while our government has forgotten its primary object, it has not failed in its regard to special legislation. Protection, which ought to mean equal rights for all, has been used to juggle with. We have protected the manufacturers and the liquor interests, at the expense of the farming and laboring classes, and at the expense of public morals. After thirty years of trial, there is at best, a partial result. Now let us have real protection for all.

—Rev. M. A. Gault preached last Sabbath in Douglas Hall, in this city, where Rev. W. M. Howie's congregation is holding services with quite encouraging success. Bro. Howie is in full sympathy with the cause of anti-secrecy, and will arrange for a meeting in the hall at the first favorable opportunity.

THE HOME.

THE LOVE UNSPEAKABLE.

"For God so loved the world"—O love Divine!
 Love which our human hearts but faintly feel;
 Love whose vast depth no uttered words reveal;
 Love which makes light in this dark soul of mine;
 Behold! we know thee by this awful sign—
 A cross whereon large drops of blood congeal,
 A rock-hewn sepulchre, a shattered seal,
 And a full cup with bitter tears for wine!
 O love unspeakable! Dear love of God!
 Love manifest in measureless sacrifice,
 Teach us to walk the way which Christ hath trod,
 Though sands should scorch our feet, and on our eyes
 Smite the fierce desert sun, and briers prod
 Our shrinking flesh—till suffering make us wise.

—Rev. James B. Kenyon.

A WORD TO MOTHERS.

The following clipped from that excellent little paper, the Pacific Banner, edited and published by Mrs. A. J. Bailey, National and World's Superintendent of the Department of Peace and Arbitration in the W. C. T. U., should be read and pondered by every mother in our land:

"A mother trains her boy to keep no secret from her. Weary though she may be with the labor and care of the past day, she yet finds time to rehearse with him all that has transpired during the day in his little world. She can advise and caution him in her own wise motherly way. But when her child has entered into manhood and wants to join the lodge because all the other young men do, the poor, blinded mother is proud that her boy can belong to that old and honored society to which her pastor, her husband, the mayor, the judge, and so many others belong. She does not remember that perhaps Charlie will meet at the lodge nine ungodly men where he meets one Christian.

"Well, the young man is to be initiated. What he must pass through the mother will never know. Some societies call a special meeting at which to initiate a candidate, and refreshments are served. Charlie feels honored that such preparations are made for him. He is at the important age of life. He shrinks, at first, from taking the offered cigars and drinks. What will mother say? he asks himself. But mother will never know. Of course not! Is he not in the most secret place in the world? Nobody would tell what transpired in the lodge room. If he took the cigar or liquor in a saloon or drug store somebody might tell of it. But he feels perfectly safe in this retreat. Moreover, was not this banquet prepared especially for him; and what would all the first men of the town, to whom he has always looked up from a child, say if he should refuse in their presence?

"The young man goes home enthusiastic over the novelty of the step he has taken. But what a gap is there between mother and son! He can talk over what has transpired with a stranger, a foreigner, perhaps whom he has known but a few hours, but not with her, his mother, who would give her life for his if necessary. And who knows but what this secret will cause him to keep from her in the future other secrets which she should know?"

Mrs. Bailey adds: "We know of a young man who, while being initiated into a secret society in a certain high school, was blindfolded, and on opening his eyes he found himself in a coffin and a human skeleton was standing at his side. In the same school a boy was initiated into a secret society which must have used some chemicals in the process, for his clothes were spoiled by a corrosive."

Education in this matter, to do any good, must begin with the boys, and we might well say now that secret societies are claiming even the little ones, with the infant in arms.—The Home Light.

AN HEROIC WOMAN.

Just outside the city limits of Auburn, N. Y., stands an unpretentious little house surrounded by a motley, yet picturesque, collection of tiny cabins, sheds, pens, and kennels.

This modest home shelters a varying crowd of lame, halt, and blind widows, orphans and wayfarers, all depending for care and support upon an old black woman, whose heroic deeds in plague-stricken camps, and on bloody battle-fields as scout and spy, as deliverer of her people, and defender of the oppressed, have made for her a name as worthy of being handed down to posterity as Grace Darling's, Florence Nightingale's or Joan of Arc's.

This woman, a full-blooded African, with the signs of her 70 years set in deep wrinkles and stooping shoulders, has perhaps done more than any single individual to free her nation and hasten the "crash of slavery's broken locks."

After making her own escape, by almost superhuman efforts, from slavery, taking her life in her hands, she returned to the South nineteen times, bringing back with her nearly 400 slaves to the land of liberty.

At the beginning of the war she was sent to the South by Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, to act as scout and spy for our armies. She was a trusted friend and confidante of John Brown, who drew up his constitution at her house, and who used to refer to her as "General Tubman."

This woman was a personal friend of Thomas Garrett, Gerrit Smith, Wendell Phillips, Fred Douglass, and William Lloyd Garrison, who delighted to introduce her to a cultivated Boston audience as his "Foster-sister, Moses."

LITTLE KINDNESSES.

A dozen years ago I was driving over some picturesque, but rather hard, New Hampshire hills of a range in which Blue Job is the most prominent. I walked up the long hill beside my horse and was glad to find, part way up, a roadside watering tub, placed there under the humane New Hampshire laws. It was under some trees, and a wooden pipe brought the coolest and purest water out from under the rocky hill. But there was something more. Resting upside down, upon two stakes driven into the ground, were two cups shaped like a child's silver mug, and made of the sweetest and cleanest birch bark. No house was near. I do not know who made those cups; but the stitches showed the handiwork of some girl who had made these cups for the comfort of unknown wayfarers like myself. I hope that girl has a happy home. Her thoughtfulness, in this little kindness, makes me bless her memory.

Little things can add much to human happiness. Little things are sometimes heroic. I have often wished that our Sunday-school literature could make much of historic stories like that of Sir Philip Sidney, who, being mortally wounded under the walls of Zutphen, called for water, but who, when they brought it, told them to give it untasted to a wistful private soldier suffering like himself. "Thy necessity," said the gallant Christian gentleman and true soldier, "is yet greater than mine." Our young people should be nurtured upon food like this. One such incident is worth a hundred ordinary volumes.

The doctrine of human rights is altogether overdone. One's rights are of far less consequence than one's righteousness, and one's righteousness is far less honorable than one's sacrifice. Have you not noticed that when ministers stand up for their rights they begin to lose their privileges? If a pastor cannot trust to the generous kindness of a people, it is better for him to go elsewhere. Most people know, however, that little kindnesses touch the minister's heart. But little kindnesses require thoughtfulness. It is a kind thing for a person who has horses and carriages to take a less fortunate neighbor who is in delicate health out for a drive. Go yourself, and don't send your coachman. A little thought will give happiness and comfort to somebody at little or no cost. A few buds in a sick room are Gospel. They are more than beauty; they are the expression of Christian love.

There is a deep principle in this matter of little kindnesses. They are a duty. One may say he is under no obligation to give some flowers to a sick-room, but he is mistaken. He owes the gift of those flowers, not to the sick neighbor or the crippled child, but he owes it to himself to do it. The girl who made the birch bark cups owed it to her unselfish nature. It was a duty to herself. When one says that the Lord Jesus was under no obligation to redeem men by his suffering, it is a mistake. The Lord was under obligation to do it, not under obligation to the sinner, but under obligation to his own great soul. One has no right to limit himself by his rights. Love makes duties.

I may as well parallel the case of Sidney with another. My friend, Wilder Dwight—we slept under the same blanket in the open night before Antietam—lay mortally wounded in the battle. The surgeon came to him as he lay suffering. The Christian man pointed to other wounded men lying near: "Attend to them first; I can bear it better than they."—Congregationalist.

A CAT OF CHARACTER.

In the mountain districts of Pennsylvania two wrens had built their nest under the eaves of an old farmhouse, and there they reared a small and interesting family. Among the members of the farmer's household was a white cat, and when the wrens became so tame that they used to hop around the piazza in search of crumbs, the cat would lie in wait for them, and several times came within a bit of catching the adult birds. When the farmer noticed this, he punished the cat, and she finally learned that it was dangerous to fool with the wrens.

When the baby wrens grew larger, one of them fell out of the nest one day, and being too weak to run, and unable to fly, lay helpless on the grass. The cat saw the accident, and ran rapidly to seize the bird; but seeming to remember the lesson taught her, when she reached the helpless little thing, she only touched it daintily with her paw, and then lay down and watched it.

Presently there came a black and yellow garden snake toward the fluttering birdling. The cat was dozing, and was awakened by the fluttering of the bird. Instantly she rose, and struck at the reptile with her paw. This was an enemy the snake did not appreciate, but it was hungry, and darting forward, attempted to seize the bird under the very shelter of the cat's head. Like a flash the cat seized the snake just back of the head, and killed it with one bite. When the farmer happened along in the afternoon, he found the cat crouching in the grass sheltering the bird, and ten feet away was the dead snake. This made it clear that the cat had carried the bird away from the snake. The young adventurer was soon restored to his anxious parents.

HEART EXPERIENCE.

The following bit of heart experience, given to the writer years ago, is well worth repeating for the benefit of other tossed lives, as their number is legion:

"It is the queerest thing."

"Well, then, it must be very queer," said grandmother, with a twinkle in her deep-set eyes.

"It is; just as soon as I get settled comfortably anywhere or in anything, I have to be jostled, upset, tumbled out; I have not felt at home for a day and a night for seven years. If I am being punished, I am being dreadfully punished."

Grandmother peered at me over her glasses, but said not a word. I felt rebuked, but went on grumbling.

"We thought we were settled in that lovely home in the country. John's health was good there, and the children frisked like lambs; then that mortgage had to come and it had to be paid off, and the lovely place had to be sold for three-quarters what we paid for it, and we boarded awhile and were homeless. I came nearer 'nestling' there, than I ever did anywhere; then John exasperated me by quoting some old saint's prayer: 'Lord, when thou seest I am about to nestle put a thorn in my nest.' I told him that was the spirit of Pascal, who thrust iron spikes into his naked flesh; and would have none of it. Yet I did try to be thankful and humble, and then had to have my roof taken away from me. Oh, how it hurt; while I thought of the old saint's prayer, and wondered if I had 'nested.'"

"And now this! We must give up this home. This is the third satisfying home I have had to give up in less than seven years."

I was not grumbling now; I was penitent and in tears. Grandmother did not look sharply at me; she kept her eyes on her darning.

"Do you know what the Lord said about Moab, once?"

About Moab? How she lived among those old names! The name suggested Ruth, nothing else.

"Is he saying about me, what he said about Moab?" I queried, incredulous.

"I will tell you and you can judge. It was my portion this morning. You know how full my life has been of changes. Your life reminds me of my own. If this truth may only mean to you what it means to me!"

"I think I am ready for it, grandmother," I said, touched by her voice.

"I know you are. The Lord said this about Moab: 'Moab hath been at ease from his youth, and he hath settled on his lees, and hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel.'"

What a light shone in grandmother's old eyes!

"Now do you want to know what happened to him because he had not been emptied from vessel to vessel, because he had not been 'jostled,' upset and tumbled out, like you? 'Therefore his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed.' Do you want your natural 'taste' to remain in you, your natural 'scent' not to be changed? Do you want to be at 'ease' and not have the best blessings?"

"But is it doing me good?" I murmured, remembering my discontent.

"I am sure you love heaven as you never would do, if earth were one unchanging comfortable-ness."

"I know it. I went to sleep last night glad that heaven would be a resting-place, even if earth pushed me about so."

"God has work for you to do, in each place that he empties you into. He knows your tendency to 'settle down.' He knows how your heart needs to be uprooted; that it has a natural clinging to old places and old friends. He wants you to have a new taste and new scent; he sees some taste and some scent in you that he wants to change; and nothing but stirring you up by emptying you out will make that decided change. You will be pure and strong with his taste, if you let him work his changes in you. Isn't it worth it?"

It was worth it, yes. But oh, how hard it was to leave the home we had planned and built: my sunshiny chamber, the family room, the garden we had planted, and the flowers that would bloom next year, when we were not there to see them! Such sunrises and such sunsets! Would the morning star ever shine so golden through the rosy light anywhere on earth as I saw it this morning from my chamber window?

But there was Moab, with the unchanged scent and taste; and there would I be, with something in me that God did not love, something that stopped short of his idea of what he would make of me and with me, if he did not empty me from home to home. That was his way of changing me.

"Yes," was all I said; and then I went out into my pretty kitchen to get tea, and to hope that I would do God's work more faithfully in my next new home.

This is the story for the wanderers who "have here no continuing city."—Helen S. Thompson.

I WOULDN'T BE CROSS.

I wouldn't be cross, dear, it's never worth while;
Disarm the vexation by wearing a smile.
Let hap a disaster, a trouble, a loss,
Just meet the thing boldly, and never be cross.

I wouldn't be cross, dear, with people at home,
They love you so fondly, whatever may come.
You may count on the kinsfolk around you to stand,
Oh, loyally true in a brotherly band!
So, since the fine gold far exceedeth the dross,
I wouldn't be cross, dear, I wouldn't be cross.

I wouldn't be cross with a stranger, ah no!
To the pilgrims we meet on the life-path we owe
This kindness to give them good cheer as they pass;
To clear out the flint-stones, and plant the soft grass.
No, dear, with a stranger, in trial or loss,
I perchance might be silent, I wouldn't be cross.

No bitterness sweetens, no sharpness may heal
The wound which the soul is too proud to reveal;
No envy hath peace; by a fret and a jar
The beautiful work of your hands we may mar;
Let happen what may, dear, of trouble and loss,
I wouldn't be cross, love, I wouldn't be cross.

Did you ever hear of a community which enrolled among its substantial and public-spirited citizens the names of its saloon-keepers, with their business occupation affixed?

Did you ever hear of a saloon-keeper being mentioned in any public place as a hero, a philanthropist, a true gentleman, a man of noble mind, or as a public benefactor of any sort?

TEMPERANCE.

ADVANCED PROHIBITION IN CANADA.

Only a few weeks have turned since the Alliance convention in Montreal, when Advanced Prohibitionists were convinced that they must proceed independent of the Dominion Alliance, if anything practical was to be done in the way of organizing the temperance forces. In these few weeks splendid results have been achieved, and already there is effective organization in twenty different constituencies, and a number of single clubs instituted in others.

The organizer, Mr. W. G. Fee, is an experienced hand, and he has visited and effected organization in the following ridings: East and West Peterborough, S. Victoria, W. Northumberland, East and West Durham, South Ontario, East and West New York, North Simcoe, Grey and Wentworth. The cities of Toronto, Montreal, Fredrickton and Hamilton are also in line, and a number of clubs have been instituted by local workers in Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. Fee reports that he has met with marked success wherever he has gone. Not only ordinary temperance men, but many strong party workers, some of them holding high official positions in Liberal and Conservative party associations, have gone into the new club movement and cut themselves adrift from party, so as to be able to act independently upon this great issue of prohibition. Hundreds who are opposed, out and out, to the idea of trying to build up a new full-fledged political party, are ready to join in enthusiastically with the movement for independent political action.

The president of one party association said: "If my party will not nominate a man who will take the Candidate's Pledge of the Advanced Prohibitionists, then I have no use for the party; therefore I join in with the club." And he did join. Here is the candidate's pledge:

"I, _____, of the _____ of _____, in the county of _____, in the electoral district of _____, am in favor of the immediate total prohibition of the liquor traffic, and if elected to the House of Commons (or the Legislative Assembly) I pledge myself to introduce, or see that there is introduced, at the earliest opportunity, a resolution committing the Parliament to a prohibitory law; and further pledge myself to introduce, or see that there is introduced, at the earliest opportunity, a motion of want of confidence on the prohibition question in any government which fails to commit itself to the adoption of a law suppressing the liquor traffic."

In Fredrickton and York county, N. B., the Advanced Prohibitionists put a candidate of their own in the field, and defeated the Premier of the province in his own home constituency. One of the real funny things in connection with this battle was the announcement of the Citizen, that the "Alliance" did the business. There has not been a ghost of alliance organization in York county or in the province for years. It is true that the leaders of the movement were at the Montreal convention, but they came there as Royal Templar representatives, and were also members of the Provisional Committee of the Advanced Prohibitionists. This step was the direct and immediate result of the Advanced Prohibition movement.

We urge the friends of prohibition in every municipality to take up and push forward the work of uniting the Christian temperance electors for independent political action. Do not wait for a visit from the organizer. Mr. Fee may not be able to reach your locality for several weeks, perhaps months. Call together the temperance workers of your town or village, and form yourselves into a Prohibition club at once. Secure the necessary pledge books and forms, and see that every voter over eighteen years of age, in your municipality, is canvassed for membership in the club. The thorough organization of your riding for election purposes will be pushed on as rapidly as possible. You can greatly facilitate this work by starting this organization in your locality. Presidents of W. C. T. unions, Christian Endeavor and Epworth leagues, should interest their associations in this work. In many ridings our most active workers come from the ranks of the above-named societies. The Provisional Committee are determined that the "suppression of the liquor traffic" shall be made a live issue in all Provincial and Dominion elections. No Christian elector shall have an opportunity of shielding himself behind the excuse, "this question was not an issue." All shall have an opportunity to vote as they pray. We appeal to every God-fearing man and woman in Canada for support and assistance in this great work. Think over it, pray over it, and we have no fears as how you will act.

Next week we shall print a list of those who have subscribed and paid funds to help this movement, and we hope the list will grow larger during the week. More funds are very much needed to properly equip the organization movement, and there is no source of revenue except the free-will offerings of those interested in the work. The members of the committee have subscribed liberally themselves; they have paid their own expenses to meetings; they have been prompt and vigorous, and they have good results to show. Surely those who are in sympathy will cast in their mite and help with this important work of making a start. As soon as one hundred clubs are organized, a convention will be called to effect permanent organization. Applications for literature may be made to the chairman, W. W. Buchanan, Hamilton, the secretary, R. W. Dillon, Spadina Ave., Toronto, or the organizer, W. G. Fee, 224 Sorauren Ave., Toronto. Subscriptions should be sent to the treasurer, James Thomson, 27 Walton street, Toronto.—Hamilton (Can.) Templar, Nov. 18.

SPIKE THAT GUN.

The great struggle for victory on the heights of Inkerman was decided by a young officer bravely carrying out an order to spike a gun that was sweeping down the troops with its shot and shell. The battery had to be approached with great care, or the attacking party would be swept away before ever the gun could be reached. The officer in command led his men under cover of some rising ground, and then waited his opportunity to face the battery. At first, a brother officer who accompanied the party said it was perfect madness to attempt an attack, and the men began to feel that it was charging into the arms of death; but the officer who had received the order to spike the gun was determined to carry it out or die in the attempt, and addressing his small party, said: "If no man will stand by me, I shall go alone. Who'll volunteer?" and immediately he went out from the shelter of the rising ground where he halted his men and faced the battery. No sooner did the men see his brave determination to carry out his instructions than they rushed to the front, and with a victorious shout took the battery and spiked the gun. That brave deed turned the battle scales to victory in favor of the British. The Russians lost all heart when the battery, which had done such deadly mischief to the troops all that fearful day, was silenced and the gun spiked.

The great conflict between good and evil is still raging. Year after year rolls on, and the deadly strife continues. The ranks have been thinned, gaps made, homes desolated, families broken up, and thousands have passed away. One of the great, if not the greatest, difficulties in the progress of every good work is drink. It is one of the most prolific sources of evil that the civilized world has ever seen. It baffles our legislators. It startles the church. It blights the progress of Christianity. It hinders the advance of missions. It degrades our army, and is found to be the chief agent in supplying pauperdom with starving beggars, madhouses with the insane, and orphanages with the fatherless. Crime is fed by it; jails, reformatories and penitentiaries are crowded with its victims. Men have lost their honesty and women their virtue through the effects of drink. Good has been weakened, evil has been strengthened by the baneful interests of drink. Whether we speak of high or low, the educated or ignorant, the wealthy or poor, from each drink has claimed its victims and scattered seeds of misery in all ranks, which have produced a sad harvest of wretchedness, woe and death, sufficient for us to point out the danger in which every good work is placed, so long as that infernal weapon of evil is belching forth its deadly missiles against those enterprises which are making war upon sin, and the enormous disadvantages at which they war, so long as drink is allowed to decimate their ranks and destroy their hopes of success. For the sake of all that is true and good on earth, we raise the cry: Spike that gun!

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Trouble from false teachers. Vs. 12, 13. In one sense this was the first ecclesiastical council ever held; at least we have no record before this of a meeting of the apostles for the express purpose of settling disputed points of creed or doctrine. That it was considered a very important matter is evident from the fact that a multitude were gathered together to hear the result of their deliberations. Certain false teachers, from Judea, were sowing the seeds of dissension and schism among the new converts, by telling them that salvation was impossible unless they submitted to the Judaistic rite of circumcision, thus involving them, as Paul afterwards told the Galatians, in an obligation to keep the whole ceremonial law. These teachers are elsewhere spoken of as "false brethren" (Gal. 2: 4), who "came in privily to spy out their liberty in Christ Jesus." They were, in fact, the Jesuits of that day, working under the cloak of great religious zeal, and trying to do for the Jewish church what Jesuitism is now trying to do for Rome—infuse into it new life by fettering those who are or should be free in Christ Jesus, with a heavy burden of rites and ceremonies which he never commanded. At the present time ritualism is making tremendous strides, even in the Congregational church, which originated in the protest of our New England forefathers for spiritual freedom and a pure worship. Times and seasons are being observed which are not of God's appointment. The keeping of Lent, Good Friday and other church days may have, as Paul tells us in Col. 2: 23, "a show of wisdom." There may be plausible arguments advanced even for the most unscriptural observances of the Romish church; but he adds that these things "are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh." (R. V.) That is, they do not help one in the least to advance on the line of true holiness, but all self-invented penances, and rites, and ceremonies, not sanctioned by the Word of God, have a directly opposite effect. They tend to stupefy the conscience and make it easier to neglect actual duties, and even to commit gross sin, under the delusion that all can be atoned for by extra faithfulness to these outward acts of devotion.

2. The decision of James. Vs. 14-21. Peter, at the beginning of the meeting, in a few strong words, had laid the situation before them. He alluded to the first work among the Gentiles, at the conversion of Cornelius, in which God had made him the chief instrument, blessing Jew and Gentile alike with the same spiritual gifts. Should they now, he asked, "tempt" (that is, provoke) God by putting a yoke on the necks of these converts from heathenism which even the most spiritually inclined among themselves had found an intolerable burden? James, as the acknowledged head of the council, makes the closing speech; and though he modestly affirms it to be his own private judgment, it carries with it the weight of a final decision. Rome claims Peter as the head of the church, but it is certain that he occupied no such position at this time. God was now fulfilling his promise spoken of old by the prophets, in visiting the Gentiles to "take out of them a people for his name," and thus spiritually rebuilding the tabernacle of David which had fallen down. He had given them the Holy Spirit, and borne witness by miracles and signs that they were his elect children—all without circumcision. They had no right to require of these converted Gentiles more than God did. James' decision was to lay upon them only a few simple commands: First, "that they abstain from idols." This command is equally needed by young converts to-day, who for lack of faithful warning are so often beguiled into the false worships of the lodge. Next, from fornication, always associated with idolatry and the crying sin of the heathen world. Lastly, "from things strangled and from blood." This last prohibition was intended to prevent them from shocking needlessly the prejudices of the Jews around them, for in every city colonies of Jews had settled, and built synagogues in which the laws of Moses were read every Sabbath-day. No matter how true our message, we shall always win more hearers by conciliating their prejudices, when to do so does not involve us in actual sin. It is a mistake to make our onslaughts even on error and superstition too violent instead of proceeding gently, thus allowing the darkened heart and mind time to receive the light.

3. Their decision borne to the church at Antioch. Vs. 22-29. To set the minds of their Gentile brethren more effectually at rest, and silence their disturbers, they chose two of their chief men to accompany Paul and Barnabas as bearers of a fraternal epistle which is remarkable for the spirit of oneness in Jesus Christ which breathes through it, and the utter absence of any tone of superiority. No wonder that when it was received and read they "rejoiced for the consolation."

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The Baptists of Great Britain appear to be making excellent progress with their centenary fund. The London Freeman reports £98,000 ($490,000) and more as pledged, and adds: "Probably by this time it has reached £100,000 ($500,000). It proposes that now £16,000 ($80,000) be added as a further fund, for 'meeting arrears, accumulation of debt.' In this way the $500,000 pledged will be wholly 'for work in the future.' Without doubt there are many in our own country who would be glad to know, in a like specific way, what progress American Baptists are making in the matter of their own centennial million.

BRETHREN.

—From Dobbin, W. Va., we are asked, "Is it right to join any lodge or secret order?" In several articles which we have written on this subject, our views have been fully given. For the lodge we, as Christian people, have no use, and every step towards the lodge is a step away from the church. The Christian brotherhood contains all that God knew would be for his people's highest good. To pretend towards more and better is to ignore God's wisdom and lean upon our own. Should we do this? We answer, a thousand times, No.—Gospel Messenger, Mt. Morris, Ill., Nov. 22.

CHINESE CONVERTS.

—On the Pacific Coast there are now resident over two thousand Christian Chinese who have been received into membership in the various evangelical churches. That they are genuine converts, and some of them persons of great worth, cannot be doubted. Many converts have returned to their own land to be engaged as missionaries there. Rev. Dr. Pond, pastor of Bethany Congregational church in San Francisco, writes: "One-third of the 336 members of Bethany church, of which I am pastor, are Chinese believers."

—Dr. McLean, of Oakland, who has fifty Chinese members in connection with his church, writes that they are as consistent Christians as any fifty of his American church members.

—The Chinese of the Congregational missions last year contributed $6,290 to the treasury of their local missions. Forty-five missionaries have been employed; 16 of these are Chinese.

—The extent of the work being done under the auspices of the American Missionary Association in California mainly is indicated by the following statistics: They have 19 mission schools; 38 teachers; 1176 pupils; 222 who have abandoned idolatry; and 178 professing faith in Christ.

EVANGELICAL.

—D. L. Moody completed his services in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, of which the late C. H. Spurgeon was pastor. He reports "a phenomenal harvest of souls." He is now at Norwich, holding services, after which he goes to Ireland. Efforts are being made to induce him to hold meetings in the West End of London. He is reported to be arranging with evangelists of various nationalities to preach during the Chicago Fair to visitors in their own tongues.

FRIENDS.

—Not until very recently was the pastorate formally recognized by the Friends. Then their General Conference in Indianapolis adopted and sent out to all the yearly meetings an official statement, saying: "We believe that the faithful exercise of pastoral care is an important agency in the Master's hand in establishing and building up the membership of the church." A paid pastorate is, therefore, no longer alien to Quaker policy.

LUTHERAN.

—The German Synod of Nebraska at its late session in Verndrop, Neb., adopted resolutions heartily endorsing ing an effort to raise a fund of $10,000 in the German churches to endow the German professorship of Midland College.

—The United Norwegian Lutheran Synod sustains three colleges, which were attended by 457 students in 1891-92. Two others have also been established lately at Moorhead, Minn., and Grand Forks, N. D., respectively, and their attendance has already reached three hundred. Augsburg Seminary, at Minneapolis, conducted under the auspices of this Synod, has five professors, forty-six students, and an endowment of $130,000. The Synod appropriated $14,000 for its educational work during the ensuing year.

—There is a colony of German Lutherans on Kauai, one of the Sandwich Islands. They support a pastor, and have a school and church.

—Sweden, by statistical exhibit, is shown to be thoroughly Protestant. Out of a population of 4,774,409 only 810 are Roman Catholics, or 16 out of every 100,000; and next to it in this respect is Norway, which is under the same sovereign, and has only 512 Roman Catholics out of 1,818,853 inhabitants, or 27 out of every 100,000. In both of these countries the mass of the population adhere to the Lutheran church.

—The famous old Castle church of Luther in the city of Wittenburg was on Reformation Day rededicated in the presence of the German Emperor and the Protestant princes from all over Germany. The whole church has been remodeled at a cost of 900,000 marks.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The next meeting of the Board of Bishops will be held at Evanston, Ill., in May.

—Bishop W. H. Miles, senior bishop of the colored Methodist Episcopal church in America, of which he was the organizer, died at his home in Louisville, Ky., Nov. 11. He was a bishop twenty-two years, and preached more than forty years.

—In Vienna the government has subjected the Methodists to considerable persecution and has been using all possible means to suppress them. Now their pastor is silenced and detectives follow the members lest they visit him at his home.

—Mr. Woolrych Perowne, son of the bishop of Worcester, is organizing excursion parties to the World's Fair. Mr. George Vincent suggested to him that he place Chautauqua on his catalogue of famous places to be visited. The Methodist Times says that Mr. Perowne has adopted the suggestion, and that his party "will stay at the hotel which is managed by Bishop Vincent."

—The bishops have appointed the following insurance commission: Clem Studebaker, Wm. Deering, O. H. Horton, Lewis Miller, J. E. Searles, E. O. Stannard, T. J. Green; alternates, N. W. Harris, Geo. B. Johnson, C. L. Rockwell. It is the duty of this commission to suggest a plan for insuring M. E. churches and parsonages.

—A memorial tablet in honor of the late Gen. Clinton B. Fisk was presented to the "old home church" in which he was converted by Mrs. Fisk and her family, Nov. 6, with appropriate ceremonies, at Coldwater, Mich.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The Catholic Propaganda authorities have tried hard for many years to regain the North of Europe. In Norway their progress has been very small, and Catholic churches are few and far between. They have not a single congregation in the country with a membership of a thousand souls. Recently the Parliament abrogated the law which prohibited Catholics from holding political office; but the proposition to permit the Jesuits to labor in Norway could not secure a majority of votes.

—The recent statistical quarterly statement of the German Empire reports the latest religious data of the country. According to these, Germany has 31,026,810 Protestant subjects; 17,674,921 Roman Catholics; 145,540 other Christians; 567,884 Jews; 562 adherents of other religions, and 12,753 without any religious profession. The total population is 49,428,470.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—Dr. N. West recently delivered his celebrated lectures on the Higher Criticism, in the Chambers Presbyterian church, Philadelphia. Dr. West is one of the finest Biblical scholars in this country.

—Rev. Dr. James Clark, an eminent minister of the Presbyterian church, has passed away in death. He was a distinguished scholar, a faithful preacher, a sincere Christian.

—Rev. George F. Pentecost, formerly a Brooklyn clergyman, and more recently an evangelist in this country and in India, has accepted a call to become pastor of the Marylebone Presbyterian church in London.

REFORMED PRESBYTERIAN.

—In the Missionary Review Rev. D. S. Leonard, of Oberlin, makes the following statement: "The Reformed Presbyterian church (Covenanter) numbers only about 10,000, but sustains missions in Syria and Asia Minor, as well as among the Freedmen, Indians and Chinese in the United States. The contributions for foreign missions from all sources in 1891, not including a bequest of $85,000, were $19,614, or an average of $1.74 per member."

Driving the Brain

While we drive the brain we must build up the body. Ex-

Money for Sale!

The World's Fair Directors

Have 5,000,000 Souvenir Half Dollar Coins in their treasury, the gift of the American people by Act of Congress. The patriotic and historic features of these Coins and their limited number, compared with the millions who want them—our population is 66,000,000—have combined to create so great a demand for these World's Fair Souvenir Coins that they are already quoted at large premiums. Liberal offers from speculators, who wish to absorb them and reap enormous profits, have been rejected for the reason that

This is the People's Fair==

We Are the People's Servants==

and a divided sense of duty confronts us—

We need $5,000,000 to fully carry out our announced plans, and

We have decided to deal direct with the people---

To whom we are directly responsible---among whom an equitable distribution of these National heirlooms should be made.

The World's Fair Offer to the American People:

That none of our plans for the people's profit be curtailed we must realize from the sale of 5,000,000 Souvenir World's Fair Fifty-cent Silver Coins the sum of $5,000,000. This means $1.00 for each Coin, a much smaller sum than the people would have to pay for them if purchased through an indirect medium. Every patriotic man, woman and child should endeavor to own and cherish one of these Coins, as they will be valuable in future years—a cherished object of family pride.

Remember that only 5,000,000 Coins must be divided among 66,000,000 people. These Coins could be sold at a high premium to Syndicates, but we have enough confidence in the people to keep the price at a Dollar for each Coin, as this will make us realize $5,000,000—the sum needed to open the Fair's gates on the people's broad plan.

World's Fair Souvenir Coin for a Dollar.

How to Get The Coins Go to your nearest Bank and subscribe for as many coins as you need for your family and friends. These Sub-Agents of the World's Columbian Exposition will give you their receipt for your money, as delivery of these coins will not begin before December. There is no expense to you attending the distribution of the Souvenir Coins, as we send them to your local bank. If for any reason it is inconvenient for you to subscribe send Postoffice or Express Money Order or Registered Letter for as many coins as you wish with instructions how to send them to you, to TREASURER WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

CHICAGO, ILLS.

Orders will be Filled In the Order In which they are Received.

HOME AND HEALTH.

A COSY CORNER.

Across a corner of the room where you love to sit and read have a framework of wood fastened, and on this lay a thick cushion made to fit the corner and the frame nicely. Cover the cushion with some pretty material and tack on a valance to cover the framework. Lay a pillow on the seat, and spread a rug before it. Near by set your table with your favorite books and works upon it. If you choose, a corner-shelf can be put in over the seat on which books or a bust can be placed.

A WARNING.

A physician says that Americans suffer more generally from Bright's disease and nervous diseases than any other people, and the reason is that Americans sit down so persistently at their work. He says, "Americans are the greatest sitters I ever knew. While Englishmen, Germans, Frenchmen walk and exercise, an American business man will go to his office, take his seat in his chair, and sit there all day, without giving any relief to the tension of the muscles of the back. The result is that these muscles surrounding the kidneys become soft and flabby. They lose their vitality. The kidneys themselves soon become weak and debilitated. If Americans would exercise more, and if they would stand at their desks rather than sit, we would hear less of Bright's disease."

DEVELOPING A GIRL'S VOICE.

A naturally beautiful voice is a beautiful thing, and a gift to be appreciated and cared for "reverently, discreetly and advisedly," but it is a gift which is not given to everyone, writes Clara Poole in the Ladies' Home Journal. Proper cultivation, however, and, what is synonymous with it, a right method, can do as much and more, without such natural voice, than the most beautiful voice without them. The moral of all this is, therefore, secure a good teacher, and then work with your teacher. The best teacher is not the one who, at the first lesson, will give you a solo and teach you to sing, after his fashion, "twenty songs in ten lessons." It is, rather, the one who, commencing with tone production, develops, one by one, the notes of your voice until each one is perfect, of even quality and quantity, and under your complete control. This will be a work of time, of patience, and of care; but the result will fully justify your pains. Having your voice under control, solo and part singing will be a matter merely of reading and of attention with you.

CLOTHING.

No part of the body should be clothed so warmly that perspiration is easily increased, since a rapid loss of heat is caused by its evaporation. To prevent rapid loss of heat, underclothing of wool should always be worn. Wool is the best material that can be used to prevent rapid evaporation and at the same time allow the air to ventilate the skin.

Any part of the body which is supposed to be especially susceptible to cold, or "delicate," is often the point selected for an extra thickness of clothing. All parts of the body should be kept equally warm. To heap clothing on any one part only makes that part more delicate and susceptible to cold.

The wearing of shoes with soles heavy enough to prevent a cooling of the feet is extremely important. The extent to which the wearing of thin-soled shoes prevails in the winter months, especially among ladies, is calculated to make us wonder at the endurance of human life.

The body loses through the feet, by heat-radiation, especially when the ground is wet, a tremendous percentage of the heat production, unless the feet are well protected.

The habit of muffling the neck only renders it more sensitive to cold, especially if, as is often the case, perspiration is excited. Such extra wraps should be resorted to only in seasons of severe cold or of high winds.

Changes from heavy to lighter underwear and the reverse are dangerous. It is better to depend on one's outer clothing, which should be removed on coming into a warm room.

The marked and sudden changes of temperature to which our climate is subjected during the winter months are not to be combated by changes of clothing, for this would be obviously impossible.

The thing to be done is to keep the body in a condition to resist the changes. This condition is best maintained by having the skin and all the organs active. The degree of sensitiveness of the skin in regulating heat-loss is the largest factor here concerned, and a sound condition of the skin is to be expected from a proper system of exercise and bathing.—Youth's Companion.

TO PREVENT NIGHT COUGH.

When coughing at night is particularly troublesome the thorough warming of the bed previous to its being occupied, will often avert an attack. The taking of a warm drink, preferably a glass of hot milk, before retiring, or, better after getting in bed, is equally as good. The opportunity to warm a bed is not always possible, but it is generally very easy to procure a hot drink, no matter where one happens to be. One of the nicest ways to warm a bed is by ironing the lower sheet, and as much of the upper one as is thrown back when the bed is opened. After this is done, quickly draw up the bed-clothing and place bottles of hot water, or the old-fashioned warm log or bricks in between the ironed sheets. Persons with consumption and heart disease will secure untold comfort and many restful nights if they always go to warmed beds to seek repose. To old people, with no particular ailment, what bliss for them to miss the cold and chill and feel the grateful warmth!

Drive them away—the aches, pains, weaknesses and ailments that make woman's life miserable. Some of them may be serious, and of long standing; they'll need time, perhaps, and patience. But all of them can certainly be cured and corrected with Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

It's a powerful, invigorating tonic and a soothing and strengthening nerve; a legitimate medicine, purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, and carefully adapted to women's delicate needs. At the two critical periods in a woman's life—the change from girlhood to womanhood, and, later, the "change of life"—it is a perfectly safe and an especially valuable remedial agent that can produce only good results.

For all "female complaints," irregularities, and weaknesses, "Favorite Prescription" is the only remedy so unfailing and effective that it can be guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in every case, the money will be refunded.

that time he has added about seventeen September chickens of last year. Here is the result of what they produced in the shape of eggs: January, 497; February, 660; March, 999; April, 1,203;
May, 1,116; June, 858; July, 728;
August, 614; September, 506—a total of 7,181 in nine months, or 800 a month.
During that time I have no doubt some of the birds were killed and helped to set off the table of his good wife. Mr.
Westcott is not a dealer in fancy breeds, but a practical every-day farmer, who believes in the doctrine that if you want eggs you must give the hens bones to pick that have some flesh on them.
Fresh eggs are a luxury. Give me some facts as to the best method of getting hens to lay eggs."

SOLID SENSE.

Seldom have we seen a good homely truth so well expressed as this by J. D.
Smith in Hoard's Dairyman: "A young couple in early life buy a farm that will keep sixteen to eighteen cows. They go in debt for a large share of the purchase price, but by industry and economy, they succeed finally in paying it. An only son has grown to manhood, and begins to talk of securing a home of his own. His parents, although comparatively young, have labored so continuously, giving themselves little or no rest, that strength is rapidly falling. What do they do? They begin at once to say,
'Our farm is too small for two families.'
So as an adjoining farm is for sale, the boy buys it to repeat the experience of his father, with quite likely the difference that he or his intended helpmeet has not the strength to begin with that his parents had. How sadly they miss the boy when he is gone. A man is hired in his stead, but oh! how much he lacks filling John's place. They brave it out for a few years, when mother's health failing, too, they give it up and the farm is sold. Suppose on the contrary the father had taken his interest money, and indeed his surplus income for a few years, and expended the amount in buying extra fertilizer, procuring better stock, in short making the old farm produce more than both farms will, how much better in every way."

AGRICULTURAL.

If the tools are still in the field, hitch up the team and go for them at once—get them under cover if it is made by covering them deep in a straw pile.

If farmers want anything from our legislative bodies they must ask for it.

Work everything into the soil that will give it life or add to the supply of plant food.

It is folly to undertake more than can be done at the right time and in a proper manner.

A well-kept farm builds the farmer's fame as a well-kept house adds to the reputation of the housekeeper.

A crop that cannot be made profitable when thoroughly tested under favorable conditions, should be abandoned.

When hay can be used on the farm to good advantage prices must be remarkably good if it can be sold off the farm advantageously.

An English writer has shown very clearly that this season prices of wheat have been lowered far more than other grain, in a comparison of the position now with a series of previous years.

The first step towards good roads in any neighborhood can be taken by draining off standing water from the sides. Next drain the road bed. Then pave or gravel as the circumstances will permit.

Now is a good time to clean up fence corners, clearing out stones, stumps or rubbish that prevent good grass or some other useful crop from growing there and being harvested at the proper time.

In sending potatoes to market do not mix varieties, and sort as evenly to one size as you can. Dealers like to handle and can sell better goods that show some care and judgment on the part of the shipper.

Stiff clay soils are generally benefited by late fall plowing, from the freezing and thawing of the exposed rough surfaces, which will put them into a better condition to be well pulverized by the spring cultivation.

Do not be afraid that grass left on the land will "smother" the roots beneath; remember that the packing of the earth around and over grass roots by tramping cattle when the soil is soft, is much more likely to cause a smothering.

On land freshly fertilized with barnyard manure, wheat will not make a fine grain, according to Professor A. E.
Blount, because the manure has a tendency to make too much stalk and foliage, decidedly to the detriment of the grain.

Christmas Presents.

What shall I get for mother's Christmas Present? is one of the all-absorbing questions in many homes at this season of the year. What does she need most?
What will please her best? We heard one little miss tell her papa the other day to send for one of the Chautauqua Desks for mamma's Christmas Present; she had heard her say just a few days since that she wanted one so much, it was just what she needed to keep her letters in;
then the shelves would hold so many nice books.

Many articles are given for wedding-presents that are not as useful or ornamental as some of the articles given by this Company.

The Chautauqua Desk is not only useful, it is beautiful and will adorn any home. The Larkin Soap Mfg. Co. have made some astonishing offers to our readers in the past two years, but none have quite equalled what they offer now.
(Read advt. on last page.)

You can have your choice of a Chautauqua Desk, Chautauqua Brass Piano
Lamp or a Pittsburgh Onyx Banquet Lamp. Either of these articles will make a very handsome and acceptable Christmas Present to mother or wife, and add much to the home.

UNEQUALED

For the cure of Colds, Coughs, and the various disorders of the Throat and Lungs—is the universal testimony in regard to Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. A dose or two of this wonderful medicine promptly relieves even the most distressing symptoms of pulmonary consumption. It soothes the inflamed membrane, loosens the phlegm, stops coughing, and induces refreshing sleep.

AS A remedy for bronchitis, loss of voice, hoarseness, sore throat, croup, la grippe, pneumonia, whooping cough, asthma, and other disorders of the throat and lungs, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral stands in advance of all similar preparations. It has a splendid record, covering half a century and gathered from all quarters of the globe. It is endorsed by eminent physicians, and is the favorite anodyne-expectorant with singers, actors, preachers, teachers, and public speakers generally. It is agreeable to the taste, does not interfere with digestion, needs but small doses, and is the most economical remedy to be found anywhere. Children like it. Every household should have this famous

COUGH-CURE

"For the last 25 years, I have been taking Ayer's Cherry Pectoral for lung troubles, and am assured that its use has prolonged my life. I have recommended it to hundreds of sufferers. I find the most effective way of taking this medicine is in small and frequent doses."—T. M.
Mathews, P. M., Sherman, Ohio.

"I was a sufferer, for a number of years, from lung disease, attended with coughing so severe at times as to cause hemorrhage, the paroxysms frequently lasting three or four hours. I was induced to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and after taking four bottles was thoroughly cured. I can confidently recommend this medicine."—Franz Hofmann, Clay Centre, Kans.

"Having used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for many years, I can confidently recommend it for all the complaints it is claimed to cure.
Its sale is increasing yearly with me, and my customers think this preparation has no equal as a cough-cure."— Solomon W. Parent, Upper Queensbury, N. B.

"Ayer's Cherry Pectoral cured a cough of four years' standing for my wife, after all other remedies had failed. She took less than a bottle, and has been free from a cough ever since."—J. N. Hard, Druggist, Manchester, Vt.

"I know Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is good for loss of voice, coughs, and sore throat."—A. S. Whitten, Minneapolis, Minn.

Prime, of Illinois, was appointed General Western Secretary, his territory covering Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, the Dakotas, Minnesota, Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Tennessee and Kentucky.

The National Short-Horn Breeders Association, at its Chicago meeting, resolved that a general convention of all breeders of short-horns be called at the Columbian Exposition grounds, during the continuance of the cattle exhibit at the World's Fair of 1893, under the auspices of this association, in which all breeders of short-horns in our own and foreign countries shall be invited to participate. There is now a better prospect for the settlement of the cotton strike in England, owing to the discovery that the operatives are willing to consider a proposal for a temporary reduction of wages concurrent with the placing of the mills on short time.

A Rome correspondent says that the trial was in progress at Palermo of two peasants who wreaked their vengeance on a priest by pouring a solution of corrosive sublimate into the chalice which the priest used at mass. The priest died on the altar steps.

The Eclair states that M. Ferdinand de Lesseps will resign the chairmanship of the Panama Canal Company when the summons in the action of the government against the directors of the company is served on him. The Eclair adds that M. Leon Say will succeed M. de Lesseps.

Dispatches from Athens say that more graves of great antiquity have been discovered at Mycenae, besides coins, weapons, and unique carvings. The sculptor of the latter is rare among prehistoric discoveries, and the descriptions are mostly indecipherable, showing their great antiquity.

"'Scald Miserable' is an old epithet that now will fittingly apply to Cynosureans."—Voice of Masonry. We really do not see why—they are neither scalded nor miserable.

Elsewhere, today, we print the proceedings and resolutions of the Minnesota State Anti-secrecy Convention. The addresses and action taken by the Convention indicate earnestness and energy, born of a righteous opposition to the evils of the lodge system, in all their forms.

Again we surrender a large portion of the Cynosure to reports from various agents in the field, which contain much of interest to all who appreciate the importance of the reform in which we are engaged. If the incidents referred to in Bro. Gault's letter indicate anything, it is that Freemasonry is the handmaiden of infidelity, instead of Christianity, notwithstanding its boasts to the contrary.

In addition to recommending that the Columbian Exposition be opened on Sundays, the local Directory favors the idea of allowing every nation to hold such religious services within the grounds on Sabbath as it may desire. "The cannibals of the South Sea Islands," the Christian Instructor thinks, "would be included in the general invitation," and that, no doubt, "they would expect the Directors to furnish the victims!"

The sad announcement of the death of Mrs. Mary Allen West, editor of the Union Signal, was made on Saturday last. Mrs. West last January left Chicago on a missionary tour to the Pacific Coast, Japan, and other fields, in behalf of the work of the W. C. T. U. Latterly she had been laboring arduously in Japan. Previous reports from her indicated ordinary good health. Mrs. West was one of Miss Willard's strongest associates in the temperance work, and her death will be deeply lamented by all who knew her.

If Congress ratifies the policy adopted by the Senate Committee on Immigration last week, no foreigners will become residents of the United States during the year beginning on the 1st of March next. This applies to all countries except those in North and South America. It was also decided to recommend that no immigrant shall be admitted to the United States, between the ages of twelve and fifty-five years, unless he can read and write, freely and easily, his native language; nor shall a person above the age of fifty-five be admitted who cannot read or write, except as a member of a qualified family. Each immigrant must also be the possessor of $100, or $25 for each member of his family. All immigrants are further required to bring with them certificates from United States consuls in foreign states, showing that those officials are satisfied that the parties are entitled to admission as immigrants. This policy, strict as it is, is wisely founded on recent developments connected with the social and political interests of our nation.

Jay Gould died on Friday of last week, from consumption of the stomach, at the age of 56. Beginning life as a barefoot boy on a New England farm, he early manifested the true New England spirit, and by his energy and shrewdness amassed a fortune of about $100,000,000. His skill as a financier placed him at the head of Wall street magnates, and speculative stocks and bonds rose or declined in value at his dictum. Personally he appears to have been a pleasant, quiet gentleman, free from many of the vices that distinguish business men of his class, and from ostentation or a desire to rule in "society" circles. His immense wealth and influence have been used principally in promoting the interests of railroads which he controlled, and it is notorious that every enterprise in which he embarked was sure of success. He leaves five children, who will become the heirs to his estate.

If there is no ulterior object in view, the military operations in Europe, among nations now at peace with each other, and having no visible pretext for creating war, is very remarkable. Quite recently the long-predicted alliance between France and Russia is reported as complete. If this means anything warlike, it suggests hostilities between France and Germany in revenge for the disaster and disgrace which overtook the French in the contest of 1870-71. The number of men now under arms is thus estimated: France, 4,000,000 trained soldiers; Russia, 5,000,000; Germany, 4,400,000, if her effective force is called to the field. One would naturally conclude that the other nations on the continent must be anxious to understand what necessity exists for this tremendous display of military energy. Any unforeseen contingency that can require the employment of these armies must be dreaded and deplored by all Christian governments.

CYNOSURE WORK IN INDIA.

BY REV. WALLACE J. GLADWIN.

The large circle of reformers and their constituents and supporters who are leagued together in the work of the N. C. A. will be glad to hear an encouraging report from one of your foreign mission fields.

About ten years ago, I commenced selling anti-secrecy books in India. Later on, it dawned upon my mind that you had an important foreign mission work before you. Though comparatively few in numbers, yet I saw that you were doing an important and much-needed work in America. I felt that the same blessed impulse which so inspired you for home evangelism against secrecy ought to carry your young society abroad in its operations. No field was more needy and open than great India. Here we have a very large, intelligent and educated population. Here are the old systems of Asiatic religions, springing from the same Babylonian source as Freemasonry and its fruitful spawn. Here Freemasonry is entering in the garb of modern civilization, and finding a home in the nests of its consins, the Asiatic pagan religions. Here many Christian missions from Europe and America are earnestly at work; and here, by all means, there ought to be some branch-work representing your anti-secrecy campaign. These thoughts I communicated to a few of your faithful leaders, and they saw that the hand of the Lord was beckoning them forward. Though comparatively little has been said about it in the Cynosure, yet a good response has been given, and kind contributors have enabled your Association to make a small but efficient beginning in scattering anti-secrecy literature in India. From time to time, small donations of books have been sent from the N. C. A. office to India. We have been able to purchase a few more, and by advertising these upon many thousands of leaflets, inserting lists of them in all the books and pamphlets we issue from our Watchman Book Repository, there has been a very wide-spread notification throughout India, Ceylon and Burmah that these useful publications are available here.

WISCONSIN.

The Wisconsin State Convention is expected to meet about Dec. 28 and 29. Poynette, Columbia Co., on the C. M. & St. P. R. R. midway between Madison and Portage, has been proposed as the place of meeting. Rev. M. A. Gault is now in Wisconsin, and will hold meetings during December at as many points as possible in the State. He proposes to lecture two weeks in Columbia and Sauk counties, in order to work up the greatest possible interest in the convention. Additional information is to follow later.

The last stroke of work that your society has done for India has been one of the best. A large quantity of Carradine's excellent sermon against secret societies, and that very useful pamphlet, "Stories of the Gods," were sent to me, a few months ago, for free distribution to the missionaries. A sum of money was also sent to pay for the dispatch and postage upon the same. We were delayed some time, waiting for the new Missionary Directory. We have now sent them out to about 1,200 missionary workers, Europeans and educated natives, in all parts of India, Burmah and Ceylon. Copies of these pamphlets have also been sent to a number of editors, with a notice that mission workers who have not received them may have them free upon application. Requests are coming in daily, and the pamphlets are still being spread far and wide.

Allow me just here to interpose a formal vote of thanks to the National Christian Association and its constituents for this excellent work which you have done for India. Putting these books into the hands of so many missionaries has been, indeed, a valuable missionary work. Probably some of these pamphlets will be read by different persons, so that this dispatch of books which you have thus made through our hands has been a blessed "normal school course" for thousands of Christian workers. It has prepared their minds to meet the question of secret societies as they otherwise could not have done. Besides, the pamphlet "Stories of the Gods" is a very instructive one as to heathen religions in general, and thus specially useful to all mission workers and friends of missions.

You will remember that a few weeks ago I wrote, urging the great need that exists for some special anti-secrecy worker to be stationed in India. He would represent your labors and prayers, but would especially represent Christ in opposition to the great secrecy Anti-christ, which has for ages past been seducing multitudes of precious souls. I am happy to believe that many of you are most seriously and deeply interested in this foreign mission work of the N. C. A. You will be earnestly asking, "What can we do to promote this important department of the work which God has committed to us?" Let me urge upon you the importance of consecrated and prevailing prayer. "The fervent, effectual prayer of the righteous man availeth much." Men and money are of but little use unless backed up by believing prayer. Mark you, I do not mean formal, nor yet merely emotional prayers. "Fervent" literally means "boiling" or "hot"; "effectual" means "working" or "energetic." Boiling, energetic prayers will avail much. A circle of such prayer ascending to heaven would do much towards settling the question of means and men.

To guard against any possibility of misunderstanding, let me say that of the donations of books sent to India, not a cent has been used by me personally. I have no promise of support from any mission, society or person. Trusting alone in the promises of God, I simply accept such support as any of his children may send me for that purpose. The donations which you sent have all been spent in promoting the anti-secrecy campaign in India. The India Watchman, during its fourteen years' course, has spoken out boldly and almost continuously against all sorts of secret societies. I am sure that its utterances on these as well as other questions have been a blessed missionary work under the power of God's Spirit. We believe that the Lord would have us largely extend the circulation of this paper, both in India and America, and also that he would have the operations of our Book Repository extended to the special lines of labor which he has given us to promote.

In closing this letter, which you may accept as a "report" to your Association and friends, let me repeat this request, that those who are specially interested, and who study mission work, will remember to continue instant in prayer. Do not forget poor India, with its 288,000,000 souls. Remember us often at the throne of grace. Think how intensely important it is that the right kind of Christianity should spread here. Already two-thirds of the nominally Christian population of India are Roman Catholics. Among the other one-third what a horde of worldly, wicked Protestants! Even among our churchgoers, alas, what weakness, what carnality; how few are wholly the Lord's in heart and in life! Do, please, pray much for a great salvation work in India. Eighteen hundred years ago the Holy Ghost inspired Asiatics to begin the glorious campaign of winning the world to Christ. Pray that these scenes may be repeated until the kingdom of Christ shall come.

MRS. ALDWORTH, THE WOMAN MASON.

A NEW STORY FROM AN ORIGINAL SOURCE.

It is with great complacency that Masonic writers and orators occasionally refer to the case of "the Hon. Mrs. Aldworth," whose maiden name was Elizabeth St. Leger, the youngest child and only daughter of Arthur St. Leger, Viscount Doneraile. Her experience with Freemasonry being an exception to the rule—and the oath—that no woman can take the degrees, is regarded by the lodge as a sufficient reply to the charge that the indecencies of initiation are a bar to the sex.

Mackey, in his large "Encyclopedia," says that the event transpired in 1735, which was but eighteen years after the origin of London Speculative Masonry. He says that the story was "first published" in 1807, seventy-two years later, when the whole matter, if there was any basis of truth in it, had become a mere tradition. After this publication it was confirmed, says Mr. Mackey's account, "by an eye-witness." There is much improbability about this. If the so-called eye-witness had been but 21 (and he could not be made a Mason younger), he would have been 93 years old when his corroborative testimony was given.

On such evidence Dr. Mackey repeats the story that Elizabeth St. Leger took a brick out of the wall and peeped while the first and second degrees were given. Then, trying to leave her hiding-place in the dark she stumbled over a chair with a crash, was discovered, threatened with death, and only escaped that Masonic penalty by submitting to be initiated herself into the two degrees; and when we remember the condition of the candidate in those degrees, her choice of the exhibition and degradation of her person must be regarded as a doubtful one.

The new story of this singular occurrence is given in the Independent of Oct. 13th, 1892, in the review of an English book, published by Macmillan & Co. in two costly volumes, entitled: "Gossip of the Century," by an author of some standing, whose name is withheld, but whose other works are mentioned.

THE STORY AND COMMENTS OF THE INDEPENDENT.

There are doubtless some in these days, when Freemasonry has become less Rhadamanthine in its method of treating those who betray or inadvertently become aware of the secrets of the order, who still remember the fate of Morgan or have heard the tradition of the only female Mason on record. According to that tradition, she was a young girl of noble family, who hid herself in the clock of a lodge to gratify her curiosity. Inadvertently she hit and stopped the pendulum. This caused her discovery. She was dragged forth and condemned to immediate death. But a member present offered her the alternative of marriage. She accepted him, was married and took the oath, after recovering from the usual conventional fainting fit that might naturally be expected in such a crisis.

Well, in this book we have an excellent likeness of this very lady, the Honorable Mrs. Aldworth, daughter of Lord Doneraile, together with what is affirmed to be an authentic account of that adventure, as obtained by the author himself from Colonel Alcock Stanell, that lady's grandson:

"She was," to quote from this work, "the daughter of Lord Doneraile, who seems to have enjoyed some privileges among Masons, and who was a Master; and 'lodges' were held at his house. On the occasion of one of their meetings at Doneraile Castle, they were assembled in a room or hall, communicating with a smaller room, the door into which happened to be open; his young daughter being occupied quite by chance, in the inner room, unwittingly heard all that was going on. Too much alarmed to know how to act, she at first thought the meeting would shortly disperse, and that her accidental presence would never be known; and then it occurred to her that she had far better escape, if it were possible to get away unperceived. She accordingly stole out, and, keeping close along the tapestry of the vast hall, in the gloaming, successfully passed the gentlemen seated at the table in the middle of it, who were too much absorbed to notice her. She had reached the door and opened it, when, to her dismay, she found herself suddenly confronted with an unexpected sentinel, called the 'tyler,' whose office it is to guard the approaches whenever a 'lodge' is held. This functionary, as in duty bound, brought his prisoner back into the middle of the hall, and presented the terrified girl to the assembly. A unanimous regret was frankly expressed, but they agreed there was only one issue. 'Oh, no, gentlemen!' said Lord Doneraile. 'I am not going to lose my only daughter; you must find some other way out of it.'

"There can only be one other way," replied the spokesman; 'but she is not a man; if she were, she might be sworn in a Freemason.'

"Then," said Lord Doneraile, 'she must be sworn in without being a man.'

"The conclusion was accepted; the young lady was sworn in then and there, and proved as loyal to her oath as the best man among them."

Those who have ever denied or questioned the murder of Morgan will find a confirmation of its possibility at least in this incident. The grandfather of the writer of this critique, who was a Master in the time of the Morgan mystery in New York, warned the writer in the most earnest manner of which language is capable, on no account to enter the order of Freemasons.

Our best bow, as Joseph Cook would say, to the Independent for so frank an acknowledgment of the "fate of Morgan," which Masonic duplicity, from De Witt Clinton to Rob. Morris, has studiously attempted to explain away. Also for the repetition of the excellent advice of a reverend grandfather. If the aged were all as ready to give and their children to receive such advice, the lodges, instead of reporting great increase, would be constrained to use the poorest of material in their symbolic building.

PERSECUTION OF A MINISTER BY LODGE MEMBERS.

A letter from the colored pastor of a Baptist church in Arkansas (whose name and address we can furnish if required), gives us some idea of the power of the lodge, its evil tendency, and its spirit of persecution towards those who conscientiously and persistently oppose it. We here present the readers of the Cynosure with extracts from it that will tend to confirm them in the belief that secret societies are evil and only evil, and nerve them the more forcibly to labor for the downfall of these Baal-worshippers:

"Four years ago I received the first copy of your paper, which set me to thinking, and I was angry because you sent it. A month afterward my wife abandoned her lodges, and subsequently I freed myself from their evil influence.

"Two weeks ago I began a series of meetings for the salvation of sinners. I preached on the unity and power of the church, from Psalms 50: 4, showing how secret societies hinder the usefulness of church members. I created quite a sensation, as I had been a leader in the ranks of secrecy. Some of the members of my church swore vengeance on me. I said no more about the subject, beyond an occasional reference. A week later, some of those who had been so angry with me came and told me that what I had said had also set them to thinking, and saved them from the lodge. Quite a number have quit, and twenty-two were converted.

"All the secret societies in town are to hold a meeting to-morrow night, to 'sit down' on me and my meeting, because I said that they teach a false religion. Inclosed please find the notice sent to me."

[It is as follows.—EDITOR.]

SPECIAL NOTICE.

[Cuts of Masonic, Odd-fellows, and Knights of Pythias emblems.]

"All Masons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias and members of secret societies are requested to meet on Wednesday night, Nov. 16th, at 8 o'clock, in K. of P.

Hall, over O'Neill's butcher shop, to consider business of vast importance.

(Signed) "Alonzo W. Stone, Sandy Grimes, J. T. T. Warren, G. W. Swan, W. B. Collins, Alex. Alford, S. Jones, Sam'l Gipson, H. C. Walker, S. Fullmigher."

"Please speak to some Christians in your city and elsewhere concerning my warfare. Some of the members of my church have threatened my life. The strongest man among them is an Odd-fellow, a deacon, who went wild with rage; but has since said that before he will let his lodge lead him to fight against the church, he will quit it; but he has not yet done so. . . . Some of the secret society people have threatened to burn my house down over me and my children. Public sentiment is with me. I am going to spend all the money I can, above my grocery bills, for tracts, for a month. Secretly they have cut down my collection in the church, but it was a little better last Sunday. Pray for me, and do all you can for me. The fight is on."

[Let this good brother be favorably remembered in prayers and almsgiving.—EDITOR.]

GROWTH OF "PATRIOTIC" ORDERS.

[From a paper read by Rev. Mr. De Land before the Baptist ministers of Boston.]

The secret orders of Protestantism are said to number a million and a half of citizen voters and to embrace various organizations under different names and politics, to-wit: The United League, the Knights of Abraham Lincoln, the Junior Order of American Mechanics, American Protective Association, Patriotic Sons of America, etc. I believe none of the secret orders of Protestantism wear the name Protestant, yet it is said no Romanist is admitted to membership.

Though these secret orders differ in name and polity they seem to be one in a jealous guardianship over American institutions, especially the public schools as against the encroachments of Rome. It is not the purpose of this paper to enter into a special defence of any secret societies of Protestantism nor criticisms of their plans and purposes—but rather to first call attention to what seems to inspire their movements in this country. Their rapid growth is something astonishing. They meet every week the year round. They assemble in the night time after the business of the day is over. Even though their origin is of recent date, their assembling far exceeds the number of men who gather at the evening services of all our churches. Clergymen, lawyers, doctors, merchants, mechanics, men of all classes and legitimate occupations, creeds and parties are constantly swelling their ranks. Many of them go from the churches after the evening prayer meetings close, with all the fatigues of the day in toil and business upon them.

This is a fact that is truly remarkable—every week they are receiving applications for membership. These applications are carefully scrutinized and the candidates for admission must be well and truly vouched for for moral worth.

He who would read the signs of the times has a fresh problem on hand if he would rightly interpret these citizen conclaves—which bind men by the most solemn oaths to stand by each other to the death.

They blow no trumpets—they make no use of public journals to gain accessions or multiply their gatherings and increase their power.

* * * * *

Their purpose.—It seems to be solely to defend the public school system and all the rights of the people against the encroachments of the foreignism that now alarmingly obtains among us. It is easy to see that in the threatening presage of such political events public-spirited men are carried through the atmosphere of their time with our a sense of personal responsibility and pressure of circumstances that they forget denominational lines and creeds and close ranks ready for battle in a common cause. The Bible does not tell us that the love of country is the root of all evil. The Constitution of the United States has not provided for church and state or foreignism in religion. On the contrary, the charter of our liberties still stands unchanged by Romanism, vice and war. As such it still proclaims liberty worthy of preservation and protection by law and public effort and devotion. The Lord Christ authorizes the recognition of wholesome government and the use of means in its support.

"The powers that be are ordained of God."

That part of ethics which concerns the regulation of government—the preservation of its safety, peace, prosperity—the defense of its existence and rights, against foreign control and conquest—the education of its people, and finally the protection of its citizens in their rights with the preservation and improvement of their morals, finds abundant sanction in the very pages that give us Christian churches and the Gospel.

"MODERN WOODMEN."

The Head Camp of Modern Woodmen, a secret society with a "benevolent" annex, has recently been in session at Omaha, Neb. Since November, 1890, the Head Consul reported that the order had increased in membership from 40,000 to 73,000, and the rate of suspensions had decreased in a wonderful ratio and was now almost nominal. In that time the order had paid $1,100,000 to the beneficiaries of deceased members, and had accumulated $58,011.15 in the general fund. During that period there had been 494 new camps added to the rolls. The report of the Head Banker show that the total amount received in the benefit fund was $1,129,864.30. The disbursements amounted to $1,093,200, leaving a balance on hand of $36,664.30. In the general fund the receipts were $170,052.36; disbursements, $110,856.28; balance on hand, $59,196.08. The character of the "benevolent" features of this society is shown in the report of the Head Physician. During his term of office he has received and acted upon 39,087 applications for membership, of which 3,583 were rejected. Like Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship, the Modern Woodman has no use for the halt, the maimed, the blind, deaf and dumb, real claimants for charity, whom the Master told us we have always with us to excite our benevolence and perpetuate the Christian grace of alms-giving, hoping for nothing in return.

THE LODGES DENOUNCED.

The Free Methodist annual conferences, this fall, have been, as usual, strongly condemnatory of secret societies. We append a few of their expressions, in addition to others which have previously appeared in these columns:

WABASH CONFERENCE.

We deem the principles and practice of the secret societies of the day detrimental to the best interests of the individual, and of society, church and state. And those with religious features or pretensions, though professing to be founded on the Bible yet ignoring some of the fundamental principles of that book, are therefore to be esteemed as enemies to the cause of Christ.

EAST MICHIGAN.

The object of reform is to correct error in law or abuse in practice. Reforms are (1) religious, or such as pertain especially to the church; and (2) secular, or such as pertain to society in general.

Christians ought to be actively interested in all movements that give promise of social or governmental improvement. But some reforms need to be reformed. For instance, the Prohibition party nominates Freemasons, so-called, for office. If we vote for their lodge nominees, we vote for the enthronement and perpetuation of the worst of all evils, namely, a religion that denies God and his Son and the Bible, and ignores all government but Masonic government; and we would help in putting the Prohibition movement into the hands of the worst enemies of humanity; and we would contradict all our Anti-masonic testimony and condemn all our Anti-masonic labors.

Many young preachers do not know enough about secretism to speak intelligently against it. There is a natural tendency to neglect the study and agitation of such an issue, so that there is great danger that our Anti-masonic testimony will in the near future be suppressed.

We think that more care should be taken to instruct the young preachers in the fundamental principles of reform, and to encourage them to a discreet and courageous agitation of reform questions.

A THREE-MINUTE SERMON.

There is a whole sermon in the following Report on Reforms, adopted by the Wisconsin Conference of the Free Methodist church. It would be difficult to compress more timely truths into four paragraphs:

Observation and experience teach us there is need of reform in every department of life. Gigantic evils confront us on every hand, both in church and state. Among these are the liquor habit, its twin brother, tobacco, the disregard of the marriage relation, Sabbath desecration, secretism and Romanism, with many lesser evils too numerous to mention. We are glad to note amid the gloom that stars of hope appear from time to time to help the unfortunate into freedom and safety. Many noble deeds are done by men and women who sacrifice time and means for the good of their fellow-men, and much has been done. But still the stream of iniquity rushes on, bearing its thousands of victims to ruin and death.

As a church we recognize no power to fully reform men but the power of God. We bring the Gospel of Christ to a man as we find him, telling him here is a power to save him first and then reform him in every part of his being. By reforming the man we reach the home society; and as Free Methodists we recognize our responsibility and the necessity of keeping ourselves pure and free from all these abominations, and "touch not, taste not, the unclean thing."

We urge upon all our members the necessity of standing by and living up to all of our peculiar issues, and to urge the necessity of doing so upon all who knock for admission at the door of our church. We see there is great need for preachers and lay members to heed the injunction, "Keep thyself pure."

We recognize the Bible as the only right standard of morals. We deplore the fact that it has been most entirely banished from our common schools, which we look upon as one of the many ways that Rome has of getting its slimy hand upon the throat of the American nation to choke the life of Protestantism out. In God we trust.

DECEPTION AND SUPERSTITION.

A special telegram to the Inter Ocean, dated Pittsburgh, November 15, brings the following interesting intelligence. Rev. Father Mollinger, deceased, was one of the most popular Roman Catholic priests in the United States, and greatly revered:

"The startling discovery was made to-day that the supposed priceless jewels and sacred relics owned by the Rev. Father Mollinger, and which played such a prominent part in the thousands of miraculous cures performed by the priest, are bogus. According to J. J. Wright, who was Father Mollinger's house carpenter, the jewels are mostly pieces of glass, and the alleged golden altar in St. Anthony's chapel is nothing but wood covered with cheap gilt. Mr. Wright said to-day: 'I know everything in the chapel better than the furnishings in my own house. I built the altars and put the relics in position. Very little of the property is really valuable. The ornaments and the greater part of the relics are very cheap. The display of rare gems has attracted comments from thousands of visitors, but there is not a really valuable stone in the whole building. They are mainly glass imitations, colored to represent emeralds, amethysts, and diamonds. One time I asked Father Mollinger why he did not exhibit real stones. He said he was afraid robbers would steal them. One night the church was broken into and a gold chalice stolen. After this occurrence he was always afraid of church burglars. As merchandise the collection of relics are valueless.'

"Henry Terheyden, a jeweler, one of the appraisers of the estate, also admitted the jewels were of little value. This information will hardly be credited by the thousands who traveled hundreds of miles to pay homage at the shrine of St. Anthony. Mr. Wright says it is true. Nevertheless, the legal contest for the property began to-day in the Common Pleas Court. Attorney Weger filed an ejectment suit on behalf of the Rev. Bishop Phelan, trustee of Holy Name church, against the Mollinger heirs. It is asked that a summons in ejectment be issued against the defendants, who are in possession of the property of which it is alleged the title belongs to the plaintiff."

A year's numbers of the Cynosure would make six good-sized volumes of valuable reform literature, containing 550 pages each.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The recount.—Boston's prospective Mayor.—"What is Congregationalism?"—Election bets.—The Annual Meeting.

The recount in Massachusetts has developed the fact that Russell is Governor instead of Haile, because somebody, or rather twelve or fifteen thousand somebodies, blundered by marking their ballots wrong. Of course the chagrined voters can do nothing about it, except to profit by the mortifying experience and "be more careful another time." Resignation would seem to be the most honorable way out of the muddle in all such cases, where it is plain that the one technically elected is not really the people's choice; but while princes have been known to give up their claims to a crown, who ever heard of a Democratic office-holder, with a hungry crowd expectant for favors, and neither loaves nor fishes enough to begin to go around, resigning his seat on a technicality?

If Boston elects Homer Rogers for Mayor, she will have a man who, by virtue of his name alone, ought to (and those who know him best believe he will) be a staunch opposer of Roman Catholic encroachments; for he is a direct descendant of John Rogers, the first martyr of Bloody Mary's reign, whose counsel to his children:

"Abhor that arrant whore of Rome,
And all her blasphemies,
And drink not of her cursed cup;
Obey not her decrees"— has never been more needed than it is to-day, when that cup is pressed to the lips of almost every public official, from the President downward. Added to this, he is, on his mother's side, a descendant of Peregrine White, the first child born in New England. His public and private life has been worthy of such an ancestry, and, if elected, there is reason to hope that he will give Boston a very different administration from any she has had since the O'Briens, Keenans and Learys became the ruling "pulse of the machine." A specimen of the way in which these gentlemen dip their hands into the city treasury is their voting to have a memorial of the Romish Columbus day celebration printed, each member of the common council to have twenty volumes. Alderman Keenan is reported as saying, in reference to giving a permit for a sparring match at Music Hall, that he "had always voted for these athletic exhibitions, had never seen any brutality in them, and that, as a newspaper man, he had been to nearly every prize-fight—every national affair in this country." This is the refined and cultured rule which bears sway—not at Donnybrook or Dublin, but in the modern Athens. No wonder that when Mrs. Fessenden, Rev. E. E. Hale, and others noted in philanthropy and reform, wanted a hearing to protest against indecent theatrical posters, these men could not see that it was at all necessary. If any daring prophet had said, a century ago, that Boston would have, in 1892, thirty-six Roman Catholic churches, 131 priests, nineteen parochial schools, and eleven convents, with what skepticism would such a prediction have been treated! But if it can be any consolation to the citizens of the Hub, there are other cities and towns in New England which are proportionately even worse off. Take Waterbury, Conn., where the public schools are entirely in the hands of Rome, every member of the school-board, with one single exception, being a foreign-born Roman Catholic, elected on the Democratic ticket. Of course, it is a saloon as well as a priest-ridden city. This year there were over 2,000 votes for license to only 322 against. At the same time, they should be duly credited with the effort to make some suitable provision for the paupers their saloons are going to turn out, for they have just erected a new almshouse at a cost of $60,000. Free speech is practically smothered, for no hall can be hired in which to discuss Romanism; and even Dr. Lansing, Congregationalist though he is, was refused both the Congregational churches for a lecture on "Our American Free Schools."

"What is Congregationalism?" was the subject of a late address by Dr. Behrends before the Congregational Club of New Haven. The Congregational Council evidently knows, or thinks it does; but to the lay mind it is likely ere long to be a question as hard to answer as, "What is Unitarianism?" that heretical off-shoot from the old orthodox tree. It is said that the tower of the new "Old South," on the Back Bay, is leaning badly, and shows cracks in the masonry, which lead many to think the structure unsafe. Morally, if not religiously, the Congregational churches of New England seem to be in much the same predicament; and I sadly fear that the Bradfords and Brewsters and Winthrops would not be willing to own as real Congregationalism that which will thus bend the knee to the anti-Christ of the Tiber.

It may be mentioned, in this connection, that the Catholic Review, which has lately made a bitter attack on Mrs. Livermore, in its editorial on George William Curtis, characterizes his life as "a long and futile career." This reminds me not a little of the sermon preached over the venerable Father Green, of Chelsea, some years ago, by a lodge minister, who took occasion to say very nearly the same words. Rome and Masonry are not afraid of dead lions.

The truly patriotic soul cannot help feeling a thrill of indignation on reading the item that Gen. Lafayette's carriage, in which he rode when he visited this country, was recently drawn through the streets of Boston in payment of an election bet. The man who, on being presented at one of the stopping places on his journey with an immense bowl of egg-nog, had the moral strength to refuse to touch it, saying that he never indulged in spirituous liquors—and let us remember that this was years before the temperance movement began—would have looked with no degree of allowance on this idiotic performance. The absurd custom may at least help to point out the fools, if it serves no other useful purpose; but the best thing I have yet seen recorded as the result of a political wager is the case of a zealous Republican in the township of Canaan, who used to smoke a dozen cigars a day, but is now pledged to give up his favorite weed until the Republican party comes again into power. Four years of abstinence, or longer, may liberate this "tobacco slave" from the chains of his degrading habit, and make him once more a man. If we must have betting at Presidential elections, let the silk hat have a rest, and give us this kind.

If an educated "heathen Chinese" should see the space given in the papers to the late foot-ball match between Harvard and Yale, and should forthwith write home that our American colleges were intended for the encouragement of athletic sports, and only in a secondary and parenthetical way to foster literature, his mistake would be a very pardonable one. The rioting and drunkenness among the college students on Thanksgiving day is reported as disgraceful in the extreme. "Thousands of dollars changed hands in betting, and hundreds of young men were ruined." Is it possible that our college faculties feel no responsibility for the sons placed by Christian parents under their charge?

November goes out clad all in a robe of spotless snow, instead of the russet green she usually wears. I wonder if anybody ever analyzed the hidden but potent charm of the first snowfall. There is something strongly exhilarating about it, which makes it seem an altogether different thing from a snowstorm in April or March. The world seems to lie before us like a great, white page. Shall our record for the coming year, so nearly on us, be one of faithful, earnest work and brave combats with evil in every form? God grant it!

Do not forget, dear New England friends, that the time is almost here for our Annual Convention, and also that it needs you, and you need the Convention. Come, if possible; but if circumstances bar the way, let us feel that you are with us in spirit, holding up our hands on the mount of prayer, and helping, by word and deed, to hasten the day when the lodge shall rule no more in the land of the Pilgrims.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30, 1892.

Speaking with a gentleman about the reassembling of the Fifty-second Congress, this morning, brought me some interesting information. Said the gentleman in question: "There is one feature of the sessions of Congress that I do not like at all, and if I had my way it should not exist. I refer to the largely increased consumption of intoxicating liquor at the restaurants in the capital, the big hotel bar-rooms, and, in fact, in all of what may be called the 'down-town' rumshops of the city, which always begins with a session of Congress. I dare say, you have no idea how great this increase is. I certainly had not until I was told by a man in the wholesale liquor trade. He says that the consumption of intoxicating liquor in the class of bar-rooms mentioned is more than doubled during a session of Congress. Now, isn't that a deplorable feature of the reassembling of Congress?"

It most assuredly is; and one's first impression is that it casts a very unpleasant reflection upon the personal habits of the members of Congress; but, upon second thought, that impression is seen to be erroneous. The four hundred and odd men who compose the membership of the Senate and House are mostly temperate, if not strictly temperance men, and the few hard drinkers among them certainly do not consume enough of the brain-destroying liquid to account for the increase. Who does, then? It is the hangers-on of Congress, composed of a very much mixed crowd, the great majority of whom are drinking men, who consume the liquor that is very often charged up to Congressmen. Are these hangers-on necessary to the conduct of Congressional business? Not at all. A very few of them are employed in the various offices at the Senate and House ends of the Capitol; the rest have no legitimate reason for being here, and yet the number grows larger and larger at every session of Congress. Where does the money come from to support these men and to pay for their liquor? Out of the pockets of people who are interested in Congressional legislation, who are credulous enough to believe that because one of these men is seen with his arm locked in that of some good-natured Congressman that he can control the vote of that Congressman. The whole stock in trade of the Congressional hanger-on, or lobbyist, as he is more generally called here, is his acquaintance and association with Congressmen; and so long as they are recognized and associated with by Congressmen, their number will continue to increase, just as will the consumption of liquor during the sessions of Congress. The Congressmen have the remedy in their own hands; therefore they deserve no sympathy when they are held responsible for the personal habits of the hangers-on.

"Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." President Harrison is again called upon to mourn the death of a member of his family. Rev. Dr. Scott, the father of the late Mrs. Harrison, who has made his home in the White House since Mr. Harrison became President, has gone to meet his beloved daughter. For a man who was more than ninety-three years old, Dr. Scott enjoyed unusually good health, but he has not been well since he made that trip to Indianapolis with Mrs. Harrison's remains. He took a deep cold, which continued to grow worse until about two weeks ago, when he was compelled to take to his bed. His system responded to the physician's treatment at first in a manner that was truly surprising; but later he had a relapse, and it was soon evident that the remarkable vitality of which those who knew him constantly spoke was exhausted, and that the end was near. His death was calm and peaceful, as might have been expected of one whose whole life had been a preparation to meet his God.

For several days before the death of Dr. Scott, President Harrison denied himself to all callers and devoted his entire time to work upon his annual message to Congress, which he had expected to have completed this week. No work was done upon the message after the physician informed Mr. Harrison that his aged father-in-law was dying, and none will be done upon it this week; consequently the message which would have gone to Congress on Monday or Tuesday of next week will not be ready until the last of next week, and possibly not until the week after.

Among those who called at the White House, but were unable to see the President, this week, was Monseignor Satolli, the personal representative of the Pope, accompanied by Archbishop Ireland.

Government officials say that the refusal of the Chinese, now in this country, to be photographed makes it almost certain that the new Chinese exclusion law will be a failure. The only penalty it provides for non-compliance with the law is deportation, and there is no fund to pay for that, on the scale that would be necessary. Only five Chinese have been photographed. *

REFORM NEWS.

PASTORS AND STUDENTS.

A WONDERFUL MEETING IN THE SHERMAN HOUSE—FROM PRAYER-MEETING TO DOXOLOGY.

Some time during the past month has been given to re-instating the students' work. Early in 1890, young men in Chicago Theological Seminary moved in the formation of a Students' Bureau of Correspondence, with the object to arouse, in our literary institutions, a spirit of inquiry into the aims, effects, influence, power and claims of the secret orders. A dozen or more young men carried it on with very promising results. But most of them began active life within a few months, and nothing more was done to promote this excellent work until a few days ago, when several students in the Seminary at Union Park were found ready to revive it. As their agent, the N. C. A.'s Corresponding Secretary secured a room for meeting in the Sherman House, and visited most of the institutions in Chicago and vicinity, corresponding with others. As a result, at 10 o'clock on Saturday some twenty-five young men, representing three of the six colleges and two of the eight theological seminaries, gathered, renewed their organization and took measures to more efficiently than ever promote its work.

This is the bare statement of facts. It would be impossible to report on paper the spirit of the meeting. Rev. E. B. Wylie, pastor of a Congregational church in the north part of the city, called to order, as one of the two old members of the Bureau present, and was temporary chairman. Under God his skillful leading made the meeting one of precious interest.

It opened with prayer, some one student from each institution represented bearing part. The object of the organization was explained—candid, truth-loving research into the facts respecting a powerful system, that appears at times to be relieving human distress, but more often to be intimidating courts and pulpits and press, and controlling politics. An opportunity was given for personal experience and remark. It was well improved. The varying views of some who were unalterably opposed to the lodge system, of others who were more conservative, others who approved of some forms of secretism, and one who was a lodge member, were given with the utmost freedom and in an excellent Christian spirit. But there was one point of agreement like a rainbow arch over the whole meeting—the love of the truth absorbed all other considerations, and bowed every head to its allegiance. The honest sentiment of these young men was as beautiful as noble. They entered heartily into the spirit of the organization, and their modest enthusiasm will surely be felt in many of our institutions.

As this remarkable meeting adjourned all rose and joined heart and voice in the old doxology:

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

The sweet and solemn strains waked echoes that probably were never before brought out of their corners in the Sherman House.

We can well afford to encourage such a spirit of honest inquiry. The truth fears nothing from it. Error and falsehood alone would choke it. These students do not say, We oppose, or We uphold; but, We would know the truth of the lodge system, and will follow honest conviction, come what may. God hasten the day when our pulpits shall be filled with men of like candor, conviction and courage.

Other work of the Corresponding Secretary has been to secure space for an exhibit for our reform in the World's Fair. So far, the negotiations have proceeded favorably. Men seem to be in the right place by providential arrangement. At the Centennial, in 1876, Mr. Cook, then publishing the Cynosure, was able, though by most persistent and arduous effort, to get a space only about three feet by two. We hope now for ample room to make a creditable display, worthy of a good cause and of untold value to a million people. We must not expect too much, but are more likely to expect too little, since our God whom we serve yet rules among men.

Application for a place among the religious congresses does not have so favorable a reply, nor has it been so eagerly desired. God willing, it will yet, however, be secured.

Meantime the work proceeds among the churches. The opening year is full of appointments. The petition of the N. C. A. to the Methodist fall conferences did not for one reason or another get a hearing in more than one case. An opportunity is promised in the Chicago preachers' meeting soon.

Among the friends met in Chicago is Rev. Mr. Karmarkar, a converted Brahmin from Bombay, who is spending some time in this country. He is well acquainted with Bro. W. J. Gladwin, of that city, and has been associated somewhat with him in his Christian reform work, in which he cordially sympathizes. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

PARKERSBURG, W. Va., Dec. 1, 1892.

After leaving Scio, I had the pleasure of visiting the college at Bethany, W. Va. This is the place where Alexander Campbell resided so long, and published the Millennial Harbinger. His former residence is in good repair; and I saw the house where the printing was done, although the press was removed a good while ago. Mr. Campbell was an earnest reformer, favored the abolition of slavery, and opposed secretism in all its forms.

The college he founded here has grown, and appears to be quite prosperous. It has no Greek-letter secret societies; and the Faculty seems inclined to follow in the footsteps of its founder, as to reform. So the way appeared to be fully open for reform literature, both in the reading-room and library. There is one inconvenience here: Bethany is seven miles away from the Ohio river and the railroad. But there is a pike laid along the steep hills and valleys and through two short tunnels, over which a hack runs two or three times a day, connecting the place with the outside world.

On Sabbath last I preached in the Bethel Baptist church, near Lubeck, in connection with revival services which are now being held there.

On Monday I paid a visit to Marietta College, Ohio. This old and venerable institution is well-disposed and inclined to uphold the reforms of the day. Their library is very finely arranged, and they have Finney on Masonry, together with J. Q. Adams' and Judge Spencer's letters. I gave the librarian some reform tracts for the reading-room, and made arrangements to place some anti-secrecy volumes in the library. After hearing a recitation of young men in German grammar, I returned to Parkersburg.

On the next day, I took the train for Athens, O., and visited the Athens University there. I found the institution well filled up with students, there being 241 present in the classes. The position of the halls is very pleasant, being high and airy, and surrounded by a good many well-grown forest trees. The president, C. W. Super, received me kindly, and introduced me to Prof. E. Dunkle, the librarian, who took me to the library, which is large and well furnished. I gave him reform tracts for the reading-room; and he said that he would place the anti-secrecy volumes together in a conspicuous position, when they arrived.

My reform work among the colleges in this region being mostly finished, I am meditating a journey into Eastern Virginia soon.

S. F. PORTER.

REV. W. C. PADEN IN MISSOURI.

STANBERRY, Mo., Nov. 25, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am now making a tour of these towns near about Albany, distributing literature, announcing the Convention at that place, securing its announcement in pulpits next Sabbath, and securing subscriptions for the Cynosure; in every way I can scattering the seed.

I ran down to King City Wednesday, the 23rd, and made several calls there, and arranged to preach for the Presbyterians on next Sabbath. I came up to Darlington, where the Wabash and Burlington cross, and canvassed the town; took dinner with Mr. David Butler and relatives. Was very glad to meet these earnest friends of reform and sit down with them to the Thanksgiving feast. I looked in on our Dunkard brethren at their Thanksgiving service. Rev. Mr. Hipes gave an earnest, practical discourse. As the meeting was dismissed, I asked the minister to make an announcement of a reform convention. He at once granted permission, and called the attention of the people. I then announced our Convention at Albany, four miles away. I remarked that I had been informed that our Dunkard brethren were committed to this reform against secretism. After I had taken my seat, Bro. Hipes asked the people to tarry a little longer, as he had a word to say. He said, in very plain words, that the Dunkard church is committed against all organized secretism; that they do not admit to their membership any person who is a member of any secret order, if they know it, or unless he gives a promise to leave the secret organization; and that they will excommunicate from their church any whom they discover to be members of secret orders, unless they leave those orders.

I was much gratified to find that the Dunkards are very emphatic and resolute in this matter. How gratifying if every church that names the name of Christ should do the same! And yet, what a stirring up such a simple and proper regulation would create in many of our large churches! Our earnest prayer is that God may not for a time yet pronounce the sentence: "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone."

When will the ministry more largely break the jewel(?) of silence, and speak forth in sincerity and fidelity God's simplest truth?

I had some conversation, in the afternoon, with an elderly gentleman, who said he was a Good Templar. He agreed with me that the work done for temperance by our Good Templars might be done as well, and better, by societies without the element of secrecy. He agreed that there are objectionable features in Good Templarism. Another gentleman told me that the Good Templars held their large meetings in one of the churches. Good Templarism paves the way for larger orders. It initiates into the nauseous hodge-podge of secretism.

I made about a dozen calls in Darlington. I then came up to Stanberry. I canvassed the town this forenoon, and made two calls. Some are in favor of this reform; some reticent. I made a brief but pleasant call upon Prof. John

CORRESPONDENCE.

PATIENT IN TRIBULATION, REFORMERS WIN

BOSTON, November, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—It tries a man's soul to be an anti-secret worker here. Patient in tribulation, the Syrian hermit Calimacus, came from the East to Rome, and, resolved to put an end to the gladiatorial shows, rushed into the midst of the amphitheatre, and throwing himself between the combatants, received a sheaf of spears in his own bosom, and, by dying, put an end to those inhuman spectacles. Patient in tribulation, the beloved Athanasius was banished ten times from his beloved flock in Alexandria, and spent twenty years in exile. Patient in tribulation, the dauntless St. Boniface penetrated the cold forests of Germany, lifted up his ax upon the sacred oak at St. Geismar, surrounded by a vast concourse of heathen, who stood in breathless expectation of seeing him riven through by the thunderbolts of their outraged god, converted all Hesse, and fell a martyr while evangelizing the Fusians. Patient in tribulation, the Persian Christians endured the thirty-five years the bloody rage of Sapor II., when 16,000 ministers were executed, and the number of martyrs among the laity surpassed all computation. Patient in tribulation, the Reformers endured the awful storm that burst on their devoted heads. The cloud of Roman Catholic superstition, at first no larger than a man's hand, grew until it covered the whole heavens; the thunders from the Vatican became louder and more ominous; the lightnings from the Spanish Inquisition slew the flock of God. At last it burst, like an awful waterspout, rending the walls of Zion. But it made way for the entrance of the glorious light of the first Reformation. Patient in tribulation, the Cameronian Covenanters went forward along their perilous and blood-dyed pathway, undismayed and invincible, until the progress of their persecutors had been like that of the Roman conquest: "They made a solitude; they called it peace." Patient in tribulation, the venerable father of Cameron, in prison at Edinburgh, when the head and hands of his son, who "lived preaching and praying, and died fighting and praying," were brought to him, he took them in his hands and said: "I know them; they are my son's. It is the Lord. Good is the will of the Lord." Patient in tribulation, the wife of Bradford, the worthy daughter of John Knox, when asked to persuade her husband to recant and be released from prison, holding up her apron, said: "I would rather keep his head there." Patient in tribulation, Rutherford, in prison at Edinburgh, for his faith in Christ, said: "They may shut me in this dark prison, but they cannot shut out God. These archers may shoot my body, but they will only set my soul free to go to Christ." Patient in tribulation, John Brown went to Harper's Ferry, in 1859, and gave slavery such a blow that it reeled and staggered, and in four years was stone dead. Like Sampson, he slew more Philistines in his death than in his life, and consummated the hopes of the Abolitionists in this land. Patient in tribulation, the National Reformers have been assailing the Political Atheism of our civil institutions, bearing, for Christ's sake, with the apathy of the professed friends of the Saviour-King and carrying the load of contempt which it involves. And, patient in tribulation, the anti-secret workers have entered the field. Like David, their hearts have been stirred as they hear this giant of earth, Goliath by name, defying the armies of the living God. They are running to meet this enemy with the sling and the stone; and he is now to fall before them. "They overcame by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony." Let us have a rousing New England convention. Let New Englanders come, one and all. Let all who hear say, Come.

J. M. FOSTER.

EXPERIENCES OF A REFORMER IN THE SOUTH.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., Nov., 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I hope the dear readers of the Cynosure will not think that I have forgotten them, for that I can never do. Many strange events have occurred since I last wrote to you. Some of them have been pleasant, and others of them have been very disagreeable.

We are still holding the fort at the Tabernacle in Memphis, Tenn., and endeavoring to thoroughly instill into the minds and hearts of our people the importance of contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. To tell you that our efforts have not in any-wise been in vain, would but give you a slight idea of the thoroughness of the work done in His name.

In the year 1885, and in the month of October of that year, you will remember, I was shot by a hired emissary of the lodge. At that time our churches, and not only they but our entire population of colored people, were entangled in the lodge net; everything among them, in the way of amusements and recreation, was dictated by the lodge. Picnics, during the summer months, were daily occurrences, commencing in the month of May and continuing till the month of October; oft-times one day and night's hilarity would be estimated at a cost of five thousand dollars. But we may praise the name of the Lord, for these things are almost numbered with the errors of the past; and during the last year there were but two public parades and only one picnic.

Our church people are standing firm, to a man and a woman, on the principle of complete separation from the world. Since I last wrote to you, something more than fifty persons have been united to our body, and these willing souls readily stand up and out against this terrible iniquity and slavery of the lodge.

Within the present year we had take place, in our city, one of the most brutal and uncalled-for lynchings that has ever occurred in our Southland; and while it has been very generally deplored, yet it has greatly demoralized our people. All have, more or less, been overcome with a feeling of fear for their personal safety, and thousands of our best people have left the city. The ministers, almost to a man, advised them to do so, as under the heat of excitement they saw and knew no other course to pursue. The result in many instances now looks disastrous. Bro. Brinkley, my associate and companion in the Living Way, has gone to Stockton, Cal., with almost his entire membership, and his going will undoubtedly cause others to follow. A great many think and say, "Why should we stay here to be shot down and lynched by a low rabble, when the better class of people are unable to protect us?" We are praying now for better days. However, in the midst of the fray I was not a whit behind others, and, as a result, I have lost every man and woman out of my congregation who were property owners, but six. They sacrificed all they had; and now 123 of my church-members and nearly 200 of my congregation are in Wichita, Kansas.

At that place there are two Baptist churches among the colored people. Our church folks have their letters of dismission from the church at Memphis; but they will not unite with either of the churches in Wichita, because they give fairs and festivals in their church-houses, and fellowship persons who are members of secret societies.

Last month (October) I had occasion to visit the town, to see how they were prospering in their new quarters, and I was not a little surprised to find them meeting every Tuesday and Friday nights in a little room, by themselves, searching the Scriptures and contending for "THE WAY, THE TRUTH, AND THE LIGHT." I was more surprised when I interrogated them and asked, "Why do you not unite with one of these churches here?" The reply was universally, "Why, Bro. Countee, it has cost us too much to get away from the lodge folks, for us to ever go back into a church where there is one of them."

I cannot begin to tell you how I felt; but my soul within me leaped with praise to God when I heard of their steadfastness. A letter from Bro. Mayo, who has been treasurer of our church in Memphis for ten years, and now away, informed me that they had organized among themselves, elected a corps of officers, and had commenced to raise money for the care of themselves, if any among them should become sick. Now I am in a strait betwixt the two. The people who are left in Memphis want me to stay with them, and those in Wichita want me to be with them. Those left in Memphis are not able to provide for me now by themselves, and I am looking to Him who will supply all our needs.

is doing more this year than ever. The industrial department was very nicely cared for last year, the citizens of Memphis (white) giving nearly six hundred dollars for that especial feature. Notwithstanding the fact that thousands of our colored people have left Memphis and vicinity for Chicago, Kansas, Oklahoma, California and other places where the climate is not so productive, but more congenial, we have more pupils in school than ever before. I am on the road, the better part of my time, trying to collect means to help carry on the work; but I fail to do much of anything in that way. I have been out some six weeks, and I have hardly paid expenses.

I do not fail, wherever I go, to speak with no uncertain sound. I was in a church, a few Sundays ago, when they were arranging a church entertainment, and I did not fail to speak out in condemnation of the concern, to the utter discomfiture of the pastor and his board of trustees. I find churches built with kitchens and pantries, stored with dishes, and other hotel paraphernalia, among the whites, and our people invariably like to pattern after them. I do hope the day will come when the church of Christ everywhere shall learn and teach the way of righteousness alone, and leave the entertainment feature where it belongs.

Yours for the Master,

R. N. COUNTEE.

LITERATURE.

RUM, RAGS AND RELIGION; or, "In Darkest America, and the Way Out." By Rev. O. M. Owen. Illustrated. "For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags." Prov. 23: 21. One volume, paper; pp. 125. Syracuse, N. Y.: Published by A. W. Hall. Fourth edition. Price 25 cents; in cloth, 50 cents.

Former editions of this little volume have met with a hearty reception and encouraging sale, and the present issue, with its manifest improvements, appeals to a large class of readers who believe in whatever will tend to ameliorate suffering or advance the morals of any community. Mr. Owen is a vigorous writer, and in this little work grasps subjects that deeply interest every lover of his race. While there is a "Darkest London" into which the Salvation Army General Booth is endeavoring, with considerable success, to carry the light of the Gospel and a true civilization, based thereon; while there is a "Darkest Africa"—a darker one morally, if possible, than Stanley penetrated, because of the rum with which Christian nations are flooding it—there is a wretched pall of darkness upon our own land that quite as certainly confronts the reformer with difficulties, and will require all the humanizing and Christianizing influences which we can command, to show us clearly "the way out." Mr. Owen realizes the importance and the difficulties attending this work, and presents the reader with "a vivid and alarming picture, calculated to arouse every man who loves his country and his God." The blight of the liquor-saloon; the misuse of riches; the rags and wretchedness of the degraded poor wrought by drunkenness and rum; the traps widely set to catch our young men; the false religion that fosters these social and moral evils; the trend of Romish political influence, superstition and deception, and its assaults upon our cherished republican and Christian institutions—these are brought into bold and convincing relief in this little book—the result of careful study and perfect understanding of the situation.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

Scribner's holiday number is characteristic of the season in improved appearance and a well-filled repertory. In letter-press and illustration it ably sustains the excellent reputation which it so long ago achieved. The colored frontispiece, "You Must Learn to Forget," is an original painting, illustrating "Apples of Gold," by Margaret Briscoe. The other articles which are enriched by the engravers' art in great profusion, are: The Mural Paintings in the Pantheon and Hotel de Ville of Paris, by Will H. Low; Stories of a Western Town—An Assisted Providence, by Octave Thanet; The Decoration of the Columbian Exposition (many sketches), by F. D. Millet; Miss Latymer, by Geo. A. Hibbard; The Nude in Art (several full-page drawings), by Will H. Low and Kenyon Cox; Norwegian Painters (with several reproductions of their pictures), by H. H. Boyesen; In a Gallery, by Julia C. R. Dorr; Historic Moments—The Triumphal Entry into Berlin, by Archibald Forbes. Other papers and contributors comprise the following: A Shadow of the Night, by Thomas Bailey Aldrich; A West Indian Slave Insurrection, by Geo. W. Cable; Love's Link, by Agnes Lee; Eben Pynchot's Repentance, by Edward S. Martin; "One Two, Three," by H. C. Bunner; For the Cross, by Geo. I. Putnam; Fantasy, by Graham R. Tomson; Under Police Protection—an Episode in the Life of the Late Chief of the Russian Police, by Sophia Radford de Meissner; The Virgin Enthroned—Sonnet for a Picture. The editors' monographs are able and timely. The present issue closes the twelfth volume of this excellent periodical. Published by Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York City.

St. Nicholas, in holiday attire, is brimful of interest, both as to its literary and pictorial contents. We notice, also, that the intellectual, rather than the comic element, appears to predominate in this issue, suggesting the enjoyment of a more useful and not less interesting entertainment. The leading papers, with ample illustrations, are: The Soldiering of Beniah Stidham, by Howard Pyle; Mark Twain's Big Namesake (among the great trees in Calaveras county, Cal.), by Frank M. Chapman; Harold and the Railway Signals, by Kirk Monroe; From the Postboy to the Fast Mail, by Elizabeth Satterfield; A Race with an Avalanche, by Fanny H. Merrill; The Persian Columbus, by Jack Bennett. Lighter articles are as follows: Holly Berry and Mistletoe, by Carrie Hyde; Polly Oliver's Problem, continued; Inanimate Things Animated; Mollie Ryan's Christmas Eve, by W. J. The editor's department of "Questions Answered" is replete with historical interest. Published by the Historia Company, Chamber of Commerce Building, City.

OBITUARY.

DANIEL R. MITCHELL,

an old subscriber to the Cynosure, was called to his reward on the evening of September 3, 1892.

He was born in Hamilton county, Ohio, August 27, 1834, living there until thirteen years of age. At that time he accompanied his parents to Hamilton county, Indiana.

In the spring of 1854, he came to Iowa, locating near Burlington, and in 1867, with his family, he removed to Orillia, where he remained until the time of his death.

For many years he had been a constant reader of the Christian Cynosure, and a strong advocate of the principles of anti-secrecy and reform. He was a man of positive ideas, of firm convictions, and opposed to all secret organizations, on the ground of principle. Thoroughly and firmly believing that secrecy is dangerous to our civil institutions, and inconsistent with the Christian profession, he was ever earnest and unswerving in condemning what he believed to be wrong, and equally earnest was he in maintaining what he believed to be right.

On the 13th of September, 1882, in a runaway accident, he received injuries which caused him to be an invalid for the remainder of his life. During the long period of ten years which followed, he endured great physical suffering, but he bore all his afflictions with a patient and firm reliance upon divine grace.

In all his suffering the many precious promises of God's Word were his comfort and his support. Easily and quietly he sank to rest, and the end was—peace.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1892.

Freemasonry is pagan in its origin, devilish in its principles, and hellish in its destiny.—REV. O. P. GIFFORD, of Immanuel Baptist Church, Chicago.

THE FUTURE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

From 1855, when the Republican party was organized, to 1892, when it met an overwhelming defeat in all the departments of the national government, it has included, probably, a great majority of the earnest thinking and Christian men of the North, though many of them have kept up their party allegiance under protest. In its commencement it had essentially humanitarian and patriotic principles. The limitation and subsequently the destruction of slavery, the preservation of the Union and its reconstruction on the basis of universal freedom, through the amendments of the Constitution, constitute its glorious record. In these measures it had the cordial support of the great majority of the people, and, for a time, of a number of the former slave States.

It was the party of moral ideas, and "in this sign it conquered." Subsequently it became a party, not of moral, but rather of financial, ideas—a party representing interests rather than principles. But just in proportion as it made this change of base and remanded its moral ideas to the rear, just to that extent the more thoughtful, progressive, and earnestly Christian people left it and went into other political organizations, and ultimately there was a great popular reaction.

Twenty years ago some of the best Christian people, North and South, united in the Prohibition movement, which since then has had a continuous if not a rapid growth, and is to-day the only political "party of great moral ideas." A portion of the Republicans have fallen off to the Labor, the Greenback, and to what is now known as the People's party, and a portion, in order to more effectually protest against party corruption, have gone back to the Democrats.

In 1890 there was a great popular reaction, which carried a majority of the people of the North, as well as the South, against the Republicans. Its only effect was to elect a House of Representatives, in which there was 150 majority against the administration.

But the leaders of the Republicans not only failed to see the "handwriting on the wall," but set up candidates, and laid down principles which, as extreme measures, had already met with popular rejection; and on all questions in which moral principles were involved, placed themselves on the same level with the Democrats.

It was not so much because of the virtue of the people as because of the good providence of God, who never fails to chasten his people when they depart from correct principles, that the party met a defeat that is without a parallel since the election of Harrison and Tyler, in 1840, over Martin Van Buren.

What is the outlook?

There lies before the Republican party several alternatives:

1. The renewal of the fight on the same basis, with such men as Mr. McKinley in the front. This is quite improbable, and would simply call down a third and crushing defeat. It is not seriously proposed. Even politicians learn to bow to a popular verdict.

2. A modification of the tariff plank, so as to eliminate unpopular ideas. This would represent a party asking the privilege of undoing its own work, rather than suffer it to be done by a party that had been chosen for that purpose. Besides, the Democrats have the inside track on the question of tariff reform. Reciprocity is indeed popular, but Mr. Blaine, who is the representative of that idea, is not an available factor.

3. A course that is possible is that of incorporation with the People's party. This, however, would give them no permanent strength. If the entire vote of the Populists had, in the late election, been given to the Republicans, the result would not have been different. So long as the People's party (whose platform embraces many excellent and popular principles) puts free and unlimited coinage of silver, at its present ratio with gold, in front, it can never hope for the support of the Eastern and Middle States, nor for a majority of the West.

There remains but one other alternative. The Republican party, whether under that or some other name, if it will secure the favor of God, and the ultimate approval of the people, must consent to be what it was in 1856, 1860 and 1864—the party of great moral ideas, rather than the party of selfish interests. This can be done by an alliance with, or an acceptance of, the ideas of the Prohibition party. This would make them what the Republicans have never been—a national rather than a sectional party. It would add at once not less than 300,000 voters, nearly all of whom are earnest Christian men. It would bring back into their ranks the element that gave to them prestige and power in the earlier and better days of their history. It would introduce into their platform a principle which is growing in popular favor, and in the estimation of the best people all over the world, and it would cut them loose from the corrupt saloon element which has been a dead-weight to all progress.

Whether by such a change of base they would at once secure a return to power, is a matter of doubt; but they would at least get out of bad company. Thenceforth the people would know which party stood for righteousness, and which was in favor of the protection of iniquity.

THE COLLAPSE AT HOMESTEAD.

What every thoughtful person saw to be inevitable has at last transpired, and the great strike at Homestead has again been declared "off." From this it would seem that a similar announcement, made several weeks ago, was either based on error, or else the more malevolent element among the strikers refused to accept the situation and submit to the dictum of their leaders. But the strike is now evidently at an end. Not so the suffering that comes from many months of idleness, extravagant expenses, and dissipation. Not so the immense cost to the Carnegie company and to the State of Pennsylvania, which last bore the greatest burden, though it had the least direct responsibility.

It is hoped that the lesson of this strike will not be in vain, and that the people of the country generally will discern the following facts, that are quite apparent:

1. That a selfish regard for personal interest, irrespective of the well-being of others, is the most manifest unwisdom. It is neither righteous, prudent, nor economical. Had the Amalgamated Association of Iron-workers, before arranging its annual scale of wages, last summer, consulted with Carnegie & Co. in a conciliatory and friendly spirit, instead of fixing the compensation to be paid, and then unconditionally demanding its acceptance—thus giving Messrs. Carnegie and Frick an opportunity to offer righteous objections to its adoption—it is possible, if not probable, that the disastrous conflict might have been avoided. If no agreement could have been reached after such a consultation, the workmen would have been more fully justified in laying down their tools and walking quietly out of the shops. No company of manufacturers can lawfully be subjected to coercion in the arrangement of wages to be paid by it, and every act that resembles coercion in such a case is anarchistic. The constitution and laws of the land do not recognize this wholesale infringement of the rights and privileges of employers.

2. The Homestead strike shows the folly and wickedness, in an eminent degree, of men uniting in a secret conclave to consider the interests of only one party, and especially of committing the liberties of its members to the despotic power of the unions, whether such power was represented by a majority or an executive committee. The strikers were guilty of great folly, and they have surely been the greater sufferers. By undue opposition, and their exhibition of malevolence towards their employers, they undoubtedly brought upon themselves the reward of those who can work and will not. On the other hand, had they sought the co-operation of the manufacturers in the spirit of fairness and conciliation, they might, during all these dreary, idle months, have been earning remunerative wages and eating their bread in peace.

3. We see the folly of the State in permitting, and even chartering, secret organizations, of whose rules and practices they are denied all knowledge, and whose members, in obedience to such rules, become liable to indictment for treason and murder.

Members of the secret unions are now undergoing trial for these crimes, and it does not appear that in their commission they disobeyed the rules of the trades-unions, which they had sworn to support. It is really the secret lodge principle that is on trial; and if Pennsylvania would prevent the recurrence of such acts, she must prohibit the formation of any society whose rules and usages are not made a matter of public record, and are not open to public inspection.

4. The people of the United States must be brought to understand that this "labor question," as it is called, is of vastly more consequence than that of tariffs, or coinage, and that its adjustment on lines of fairness to both capital and labor demands their earnest attention. The plan of secret labor unions has signally failed. Let them be remanded to the background, and let some plan be secured that shall include either profit-sharing or compulsory arbitration, or both.

ANOTHER DEATH AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Dr. John Witherspoon Scott, the venerable father of the late Caroline Scott, wife of President Harrison, died at the White House, in Washington, November 29, at the ripe age of 93 years.

Dr. Scott was a graduate of Washington (Pa.) College; afterwards studied at Yale; subsequently taught in his own alma mater; then married, and became a professor in Miami (Ohio) University. Later he founded Oxford Female College, at Oxford, Ohio, and became its president. After some years he retired from his college connections, went to Washington, and accepted a government clerkship. When President Harrison was elected, he became an inmate of the White House as the guest of his daughter. He was the father of two daughters and a son.

Since the accession of President Harrison, nine deaths have occurred within the family and among the attendants of the executive mansion. They were those of Mrs. Pruden, wife of the executive clerk, Major Pruden; Mrs. Scott Lord, sister of Mrs. Harrison; Mrs. Halford, wife of Private Secretary Halford; the coachman and the lamp-lighter, who had been employed in the White House for a quarter of a century; Frank A. Cox, the telegraph operator; Mrs. Harrison; Captain Dinsmore, chief usher, and Dr. Scott.

A LETTER FROM BISHOP CHENEY.

On page 9 of last week's issue of the Cynosure, we quoted the language of a Freemason to an esteemed evangelist, in which he claimed Right Rev. Chas. E. Cheney, of the Reformed Episcopal church, as his "fellow-craftsman." Acting upon this claim, our evangelical friend sent a postal card to the Bishop, addressing him as "a fellow-craftsman in Masonry, as claimed by a former Sabbath-school scholar," now "one of the 7,000 licensed saloon-keepers of Chicago."

We have been favored with a copy of Bishop Cheney's reply, which, we rejoice to say, is in every way manly and satisfactory; it is as follows:

"RECTOR'S STUDY, CHRIST CHURCH, CHICAGO,) 2409 Michigan Ave., Nov. 29, 1892. }

"MY DEAR MR. —:—Your postal card was duly received, and I take the earliest opportunity to say you are entirely off the track. I have never belonged to any Masonic organization, to the Odd-fellows, or to any secret society of that sort. The man who told you I did either told what he knew to be a falsehood, or was deceived by some one else. I remain very respectfully yours,

"CHAS. EDW'D CHENEY."

THE NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION.

We are requested to announce that lodgings and breakfasts will be furnished for persons coming from abroad to attend this convention, on the 14th and 15th inst., so far as practicable. Please report by postal card to Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, 218 Columbus Ave., Boston, in advance, or at the church, on the 14th inst.

—By an oversight the name of Rev. T. P. Robb, Secretary of the Iowa State Christian Association, was omitted in connection with his able address on "The Work in Iowa," which appeared in last week's Cynosure. Bro. Robb's long and assiduous labor in the anti-secrecy cause in that State eminently fitted him for preparing this excellent paper for the recent convention.

—Next week we purpose to print the proceedings of the Missouri State Anti-secrecy Convention. All that we have received concerning it at this writing is a copy of the resolutions adopted by the Convention. Bro. Paden's report appears to have been unaccountably delayed.

—"For myself," says Masonic Grand Orator Patten, "I am glad that ours is a secret order, for I do not believe it could exist under any other conditions." It could not. The more the light of Gospel truth is shed upon it, the more visible is its wickedness and folly, and the more it is despised by those whom it has deceived.

—"Manhood, in the perfect sense," says the Voice of Masonry, "is a great ideal of Freemasonry. The perfect cube is the symbol of such attainment." The gambler's die is a "perfect cube," yet one never knows whether it will turn up one or six spots, unless it is loaded. The Masonic ideal is happily conceived—it is uncertain.

—The Illinois Masonic Grand Lodge met this year. Its Senior Grand Warden, Owen Scott, was a few days later chairman of the Baptist State Convention at Peoria. He is a business man of Bloomington. Grand Master Crawford recommended a great meeting of Masons from every Grand Lodge in the world at its next meeting October, 1893.

—A note from Rev. H. H. Hinman, dated at Waupaca, Wis., Dec. 2, contains the following: "I am preaching every night, and make many calls during the day; so I am busy, but both weary and happy. Pray for us. I hope to attend the Wisconsin State meeting, and will write to Bro. Galloway." Bro. Hinman is an indefatigable reformer.

—We are prepared to send to new subscribers, for $2, in advance, the Cynosure for one year, and a copy of Rev. Dr. Carradine's excellent book—"A Journey to Palestine"—which sells for $1.50, both postage free. This is one of the best offers that we have yet made. The book is one to interest and instruct any household. Send in subscriptions at once.

—In connection with our own anti-secrecy literature, we will send any miscellaneous or gift-book to our readers (the money to be sent with the order) at 20 per cent. (one-fifth) less than the regular prices of such publications. This offer will remain open all this month of December, and will afford an excellent opportunity to obtain holiday books at a very reasonable rate.

—A daily Chicago newspaper gives us this "thumb-nail" portrait of Mrs. Lease, who is just now enjoying a good deal of notoriety as a female politician: "Mrs. Lease is over 30 and probably not far from 40 years of age. She formerly lived in Denison, Texas, and was known there as an agitator. She was strong-minded, and an almost fanatical Roman Catholic. In school matters she stirred up many a hornet's nest. Mr. Lease was then what he is now—an amiable person, only known as the husband of Mrs. Lease."

—The Grand Lodge of Odd-fellows of Illinois voted to spend $50,000 on a great lodge demonstration in Chicago during the World's Fair. At the same time they levied a per capita tax of 75 cents in the effort to raise $15,000 for their orphans' home. As the Odd-fellows are a benevolent and charitable order par excellence, doing a great and necessary work the churches cannot or will not do, let us make a mathematical statement, thus: As $15,000 is to $50,000, so is Odd-fellow charity to Odd-fellow bombast. Another significant item is that this one State lodge proposes to spend such a sum in our city. What will other States spend? What will the Supreme Lodge spend? What will all the other lodges spend?

—The Evangelical Alliance for the United States, in New York City, has issued its program of subjects for the week of prayer for 1893, beginning January 1. On that day pastors are requested to preach from Ps. 68:18, 19; John 16:23, 24; Acts 5:31, and Ephesians 4:7, 8—"The Exalted Saviour's Gifts for Men." Jan. 2, topic for confession, prayer and thanksgiving, Humiliation and Thanksgiving. Tuesday, prayer for the Church Universal. Wednesday, prayer for Nations and their Rulers. Thursday, prayer for Foreign Missions. Friday, for Home Missions. Saturday, for Families and Schools. Sunday, sermons on The Promised Outpouring, Joel 2:28-32; and The Plain Command, Zech. 10:1. Copies of the full program may be procured at 117 Bible House, New York City, at 50 cents a hundred.

—Towards the close of last July, Congress passed an act authorizing the appointment of H. W. Spofford, of Washington, to investigate the slums of all cities in the United States having a population of over 200,000. The act and appointment have a direct and important bearing upon our immigration laws. Notwithstanding the strict quarantine regulations established last summer by the government, it is notorious that for months the various steamship companies have been bringing immigrants from foreign countries and booking them as second-class passengers, but charging them only steerage rates. In this way a quarantine examination is avoided. The investigation act also provides for an appropriation of $20,000, to enable Mr. Spofford and his assistants to perform their work in the most satisfactory manner. Last week he arrived in Chicago, and began a preliminary survey of the slums, under police protection. The real investigation is to commence in January, in New York City, and continue until sufficient data have been procured upon which to base new and effective immigration laws. Respecting his observations while here, he said: "I find Chicago's sanitary condition to be exceedingly bad. If an epidemic were to break out, half the population of Chicago would be carried away before anything could be done to prevent it." His investigation cannot be too thorough nor too soon concluded, considering the importance of the interests involved.

E. Fesler, president of the Northwestern Normal School. This is an excellent institution, doing grand work. Bro. Fesler mentioned that he is something of a reformer himself. He said at once, upon my presentation of the matter, that he would announce our Convention to his students. The following, in his catalogue, which he placed in my hands, certainly has the genuine reform ring: "The saloon ruined our childhood home, and we hate it, and will gladly walk a quarter of a mile any day to shake hands with any person of any party, who is an uncompromising saloon hater." That is a good influence to have around our children when we send them to school. I am endeavoring to cast in the seed. The Lord will look after the harvest time and the harvest. In Christ's cause, W. C. PADEN.

REV. M. A. GAULT IN CHICAGO AND WISCONSIN.

SHARON, Wis., Dec. 3, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Last Sabbath morning I preached in Douglas Hall, Chicago, where the Third United Presbyterian congregation are now holding their services. The pastor, Rev. W. M. Howie, is every inch a reformer, and is rallying around him a band of reform-workers who will be found in the hottest of the battle. Dr. Kirkpatrick, from Anthony, Kansas, a successful physician and fearless anti-secrecy reformer, has recently located in Chicago, and has united with this congregation, which promises to be the reform church of the city.

Monday evening I addressed a fine audience in the Holland Reformed church in Roseland, near Chicago. These people, like the Swedish Lutherans, impressed me with their deep religious conviction and by their loyal interest in our cause. Many years ago they came out of the Dutch Reformed church, mainly on the secret society question, and have kept their church free from the pernicious influence of secret orders. It is very manifest that these Christians from Europe are not so easily contaminated by this modern Baalism as our American churches. The strong body of these Holland Christians is in Michigan, where, at Grand Rapids, they have a flourishing college and seminary. I was kindly entertained at the home of Bro. S. Dekker, who is deeply interested in our reform, and who arranged this successful meeting. He gave me an instance of how secret societies rob men of the right to earn bread by honest labor. During the carpenters' strike at Roseland, two brothers who were not in the labor union, and who were at work upon their own house, were attacked and driven away, and one of them seriously injured, by union men. What a pass we have reached in the march of this secret society despotism, when men cannot work in building their own houses, unless they have joined the order!

Coming up on the train to-day, and conversing with a man in an adjoining seat, I handed him one of Prof. C. A. Blanchard's addresses on "The Folly, Expense and Danger of Secret Societies." After looking at it a moment, he returned it, and remarked: "I have seen that kind of literature. It is published by fanatics, who know nothing of what they write about. I have been for years a member of the Masonic fraternity, and I know that if a man lives up to the requirements of the order he will have no use for the church." He seemed much annoyed, as I have observed Masons generally are by our agitation. There is no question but the lodges are feeling the serious effects of the Cynosure light upon their dark system.

The other evening, as my brother in Chicago was coming home from his office, he overheard, on the street-car, a young man from Wheaton saying something of the influence of Prof. Blanchard. Addressing him, he said: "Young man, I venture the assertion that you are a Mason, for none but Masons talk that way of Prof. Blanchard." He replied: "Yes, sir; I am a Mason." My brother added: "I will venture one more assertion—that in proportion to your interest in Masonry your interest in the church will decrease." He replied: "I have no use for the church."

Here, at Sharon, I find a free Methodist church almost extinct; the M. E. and Lutheran churches, strongly dominated by lodges; an almost dead Congregational church; and a faithful few, who have been driven out of some of these churches, are holding up the banner of anti-secrecy, but the odds are so much against them that they are afraid to attempt a public meeting. I called upon a number of them, and cheered them the best I could, but this evening I take the train for Janesville. M. A. GAULT.

THE EASTERN AGENT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

ON TRAIN, Dec. 1, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The week past has been filled with labors abundant.

On Wednesday eve of last week I gave a parlor talk to those who gathered at the home of Bro. Kauffman, at West Reading, Pa. I visited the houses in that vicinity and invited the people to the meeting. I found this a very needy field, but few came out. One man, coming to his door in response to the ring of the bell, inquired if I was opposed to some little lodge which he mentioned. I replied, "Come and see." He then remarked that if I was opposed to his lodge I "ought to be tarred and feathered and ridden out of town on a rail, and he would be one to help do it." I did not stop to attempt to reason with him, as I find that people who talk in this manner are too ignorant to comprehend an argument, and too self-conceited to be reasonable. They find a unity of spirit in the lodge.

On Thursday I visited Royer's Ford and Spring City, Pa. Rev. Mr. Musselman, pastor of the Mennonite church, assured me of his sympathy. He would give me a chance to present my theme to his people on Sabbath afternoon, if I would remain; but as he was in the midst of a protracted meeting, he advised me to come at another time. Eight were at the altar the night previous, and he was looking for a great outpouring of the Divine Spirit on the hearts of the people.

I found a holiness convention of the "Heavenly Recruits' Association" in session at West Conshohocken. As I entered the church Bro. Austin, of the North Reading Mission, was preaching. On seeing me he stopped and gave me an introduction to the ministers and people. I was assured that I was welcome, and invited to take part in the services. In accord with the pastor's request, I remained over Sabbath, speaking four times to good audiences. As usual, the devil was much stirred. Some became angry, while others rejoiced to hear the truth. Bro. Jones, the pastor, indorsed what I said, and aided me in securing subscribers for the Cynosure among his people. He has consented to act as local agent. Bro. Jones

THE HOME.

THE DEAR OLD HOME.

Oh, the dear old home on the hillside,
How near it seemed to the sky,
When I used to watch, at eventide,
The white clouds sailing by;
Out under the spreading elm tree,
In the clover fresh and sweet,
With Rover, my trusted playmate,
Romping there at my feet.

I would talk to Rover, and fancy
That he understood me too,
About a wonderful city,
Beyond those clouds of blue;
I could see the glistening spires,
And the great domes towering high,
And soldiers dressed in uniforms,
In the white clouds drifting by.

Words cannot tell the beauty
The melting clouds would show:
Such happy groups of children,
And angels in robes like snow;
As I watched those silent figures
How my childish heart did thrill,
And said, "They are hastening homeward
To that city over the hill."

Oh, the dear old home on the hillside,
Where my early days were spent!
My heart, as light as the thistledown,
Knew naught of discontent;
I have tasted earth's gay pleasures,
And found them empty and vain,
And yearn for the childhood fancies
And child like faith again.

But although my hair is whitening
And my days are filled with care,
I still believe in the city
That lieth over there.

One childish faith, still left me,
I cherish deep in my heart
The hope of that beckoning city
When the white clouds drift apart.

HOW CHARLEY LOWE WENT HOME.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Charley Lowe was homesick. His home was a lumberman's camp in Wausau, Wisconsin. His father had sent him to Oberlin, Ohio, to attend school. Here he lived with his brother, who was married, and who taught the school that Charley attended. He had been away from home three months. At first the novelty pleased him; the many schools, the clean, shady streets thronged with students, delighted him; but the novelty had worn away, and he longed for his home in the forest of Wausau.

He thought of his father and mother in their log house by the river, of the rough lumbermen who had always been so kind to him, and this lovely October evening he was homesick—too homesick to eat or sleep. So he lay there in his bed, thinking, and before morning his mind was made up. He intended to run away.

My young friends who read this "ower-true tale," are you away from home, and are you homesick? Let me advise you, be contented and do not run away.

The next morning dawned bright and beautiful. Charley ate his breakfast hurriedly, and then, to prevent discovery, ran out the back-way and concealed himself behind a meat market until after the school bell rang, when, escaping with some difficulty from a boy who wished to trade a few marbles for his new jack-knife, he ran swiftly down to the railroad station. Here the noise and confusion bewildered him, but, though only 12 years old, Charley was a brave and manly little fellow. It was 11 o'clock before the train he wished to take thundered into the station. Charley sprang up the steps, secured a good seat, and the train was soon speeding swiftly on towards his home. He was very happy. He sat through the long hours, wondering what his father and mother would say when they saw him coming, and the big St. Bernard dog, would he know him? He sat alone, and strangers looked curiously at the manly little fellow who looked so frequently and anxiously out of the window.

"I shall be home before long now, I guess," he said; "I wonder what they will have for supper. Shouldn't wonder if they would be gone to bed; but never mind—I'll rouse 'em up," he said with flashing eyes.

It was dark when the train rolled into the lumber town of Wausau. It stopped at the station, and as the weary passengers stepped off the train a casual observer might have seen a bright little boy who was alone, and who looked eagerly and inquiringly about him. A few moments more, and with a shriek and a roar the out-going train thundered on its way.

But mingled with the roar of that train was another sound—a sound that caused the weary-looking passengers to pause and gaze fearfully at each other. "That was a child's voice!" said a lady dressed in black—"a child's voice! and he has been run over by the train!" She ran swiftly up the track, followed by the other passengers, and there, in the dim light, lay a heap of something on the ties. What was it? A brakeman flashed his lantern upon it, and then they saw what it was—a little boy, dressed in a black velvet cap, a brown overcoat, and brown velvet knickerbockers.

The lady in black knelt beside him and lifted his head upon her lap. His lower limbs had been cut to pieces, but he was not dead, for he looked bewildered at the crowd and the light of the brakeman's lantern which flashed upon his eyes, and, looking up into the face of the lady bending over him he smiled and gasped, "I—was—going—home!" and then the poor little head fell limp and lifeless across her knee.

Poor Charley Lowe! That was the way he went home.

THE STORY OF A PIN.

Many years ago a nobleman who in some way had offended his king was cast into a dark dungeon. If he could have had books, and a light to read by, time would not have dragged along so drearily, but, except for a few moments twice a day, when the jailor brought him a crust of bread and a cup of water, carrying with him a dim lantern, he never saw one ray of light.

One day he chanced to find a pin sticking in his coat, and he was so pleased with the discovery that he laughed outright. "Now I have found something to do," he exclaimed in a glad voice. He then took the pin and threw it on the floor, after which he got down on his hands and began to search for it. It took a long time to find it in the darkness, and as soon as he had it in his fingers, he threw it down again, that he might have the pleasure of hunting for it again.

This process was repeated day after day, and month after month, and year after year, until six long years were spent alone in the dungeon—alone, except with such companionship as the pin afforded. He afterwards declared that this employment, simple as it was, kept him from growing wild.

After he was set free and had gone back to his beautiful home, he had a memento made from this brass pin which had given him so much pleasure. He had it set around with costly diamonds, the very finest that could be procured. When his wife inquired, why in the centre of the group he had placed the head of a common brass pin, he told her its story, and added, "I will not part with that pin as long as I live, for it was the means of saving my life."

This is a true story, and from it every boy and girl may learn that no idler can be happy. To get the most out of life, we must have some regular employment—work or study, and try to keep busy every hour of the day.—Mrs. B. V. Chisholm, in the Christian Observer.

HABITS OF POLITENESS.

It is said that the children of the present generation have no respect. If we read tales of a hundred or more years ago, we find there was a reverence among children toward their elders, of which we see little to-day.

There is no more beautiful trait in a child or man, than politeness. On a winter morning in Berlin the Emperor Frederick William, then the Crown Prince, and his wife, the Princess, with two of their sons, were walking along a street back of the palace, when an old man just front of them fell on a slippery pavement and dropped a big basket of pretzels which he was carrying, scattering the cakes on the sidewalk. The two princes rushed up and helped the old man pick them up, while their parents stood waiting for them. It is just such acts of politeness which made the German people so love their old Emperor and his family.

A great statesman was walking one day with a friend, when they met a poor old ragged Negro, who took off his hat to them. The statesman immediately raised his hat in return. When asked by his friend why he did so, he replied that he could not let a Negro surpass him in politeness.

Politeness sometimes brings a quick reward, as when the youthful Raleigh spread his cloak in the mud, that Queen Elizabeth, stepping on it, might not wet her shoes. But even if it does not, it brings its reward to us in knowing that we have done a good action; and it is rare that those to whom we are polite do not think the better of us. After we have once made a beginning, politeness is an easy habit to acquire, and it is one which perhaps more than any other grows into our very nature, and make the first impress upon our character.

Let us begin by being polite to those at home; always respectful to our parents. This is the easier, for we know that they always mean well to us, and are trying to do that which is for our good. Let us treat our brothers and sisters with courtesy. Ought we not to show at least as much politeness to the members of our own family as to strangers? But do we always? Never forget a pleasant "Good morning," and "Goodnight," and when we go out, the "Good bye."

Those are beautiful customs in Germany, that on entering a railroad car, where the compartments are smaller than in American cars, holding not over eight or ten persons, one always raises his hat with a "Good day," and when he leaves the car, with an "Adieu;" on going into a store the hat is removed, and on going out, the same "Adieu;" when sitting down to the table, or on arising after the meal, each one says, "Gesegete Mahlzeit," "God's blessing on the meal." Our customs may not enable us to exactly carry out these in this country, but we may well imitate the spirit. We can at least always raise our hats when meeting older friends or ladies, and lay aside our hats on entering a house, even if it is our own house.

Then let us be particularly polite to the aged, no matter who they are. Any little act of politeness will make the burden of their years the lighter. It is not enough to perform for them those duties which we cannot well avoid, but we should be on the alert to see opportunities for helping them; we should even go out of our way to find them. And though we look for no reward, the reward will come.—Christian Observer.

ONLY HIS MOTHER.

Charles Holland, at your service. A well-dressed, well-mannered, pleasant-faced boy. You feel sure you will like him. Everybody who sees him feels just so.

"His mother must be proud of him," is a sentence often on people's lips. Look at him now, as he lifts his hat politely, in answer to a call from an open window.

"Charlie," says the voice, "I wonder if I could get you to mail this letter for me? Are you going near the postoffice?"

"Near enough to be able to serve you, Mrs. Hampstead," said the polite voice. "I will do it with pleasure."

"I shall be very much obliged, Charlie, but I wouldn't want to make you late at school on that account."

"Oh, no danger at all, Mrs. Hampstead. It will not take two minutes to dash around the corner to the office." And, as he received the letter, his hat is again lifted politely.

"What a perfect little gentleman Charlie Holland is," says Mrs. Hampstead to her sister, as the window closes. "Always so obliging; he acts as though it were a pleasure to him to do a kindness."

Bend lower, and let me whisper a secret into your ear. It is not five minutes since that boy's mother said to him: "Charlie, can't you run upstairs and get that letter on my bureau and mail it for me?" And Charlie, with three wrinkles on his forehead and a pucker on each side of the mouth, said: "Oh, mamma! I don't see how I can. I'm late now, and the office is half a block out of my way."

And the mother said, well, then, he need not mind, for she did not want him to be late at school. So he didn't mind, but left the letter on the bureau, and went briskly on his way until stopped by Mrs. Hampstead.

What was the matter with Charlie Holland? Was he an untruthful boy? He did not mean to be. He claimed himself to be strictly honest.

It was growing late and he felt in a hurry, and he hated to go upstairs. Of course, it would not do to refuse Mrs. Hampstead, and, by making an extra rush, he could get to school in time; but the old lady was only his mother. Her letter could wait.

"Only his mother!" Didn't Charlie Holland love his mother, then?

You ask him, with a hint of doubt about it in your voice, and see how his eyes will flash, and how he will toss back his handsome head, and say:

"I guess I do love my mother! She's the grandest mother a boy ever had."

Oh! I didn't promise to explain Charlie's conduct to you; I am only introducing him; you are to study for yourselves. Do you know any boy like him?—Pansy.

THE QUEEN OF ALL.

Honor the dear old mother. Time has scattered the snowy flakes on her brow, plowed deep furrows on her cheek, but is she not sweet and beautiful now? The lips are thin and shrunken, but those are the lips which have kissed many a hot tear from the childish cheeks, and they are the sweetest lips in all the world. The eye is dim, yet it glows with all the soft radiance of holy love, which can never fade. Ah, yet, she is a dear old mother! The sands of life are nearly run out; but, feeble as she is, she will go further and reach down lower for you than any other on earth. You cannot walk into a midnight where she cannot see you; you cannot enter a prison whose bars will keep her out; you cannot mount a scaffold too high for her to reach, that she may kiss and bless you in evidence of her deathless love. When the world shall despise and forsake you; when it leaves you by the wayside unnoticed, the dear old mother will gather you in her feeble arms and carry you home, and tell you of all your virtues, until you almost forget that your soul is disfigured by vices. Love her tenderly, and cheer her declining years with holy devotion.—Exchange.

WORTH REMEMBERING.

The light of friendship is like the light of phosphorus—seen plainest when all around is dark.

Success is full of promise till men get it; and then it is a last year's nest, from which the bird has flown.

Do not think it wasted time to submit yourself to any influence which may bring upon you any noble feeling.—J. Ruskin.

Talkativeness has another plague attached to it—idle curiosity; for praters wish to see much, that they may have much to say.

If you love the people of God, sign the pledge; for drunkenness is the worst enemy the true faith has this day to contend with.

It is always better to pass a dozen intended insults without recognition than to take offense at a single unintentional neglect or reflection.

If you love a happy home, be a practical abstainer; for it is the most efficacious means of showing your detestation of the family's deadliest foe.

Miracles are not a breaking of the law of nature, but simply the higher spiritual power of God using nature as we lift up a stone against the laws of gravitation.

Firmness and courage in a good cause always inspire the respect even of the wicked. The dissolute may scoff at good, but they honor the man who dares to perform it.

Prayer and practice should be inseparable. God does not force his gifts on any one; they are to be asked for and cultivated. He sows the seed; we till the ground.

To be full of goodness, full of cheerfulness, full of sympathy, full of helpful hope, causes a man to carry blessings of which he himself is as unconscious as a lamp is of its own light.

If you have the good of society at heart, touch not the intoxicating glass, for most of the evils we have to deplore in our social and political life are the progeny of this prolific mother-vice—intemperance.

An old couple who tried to please God were asked: "And have you never any clouds?"

"Clouds," said the old woman; "clouds; why, yes, sir. Else where would all the blessed showers come from?"

By far the greater part of what passes for human intercourse is not intercourse at all, but only acting, of which the highest object and most considerable merit is to conceal the weariness that accompanies its hollow observances.

Such help as we can give each other in this world is a debt to each other, and the man who perceives a superiority or a capacity in a subordinate, and neither confesses nor assists it, is not merely the withholder of kindness, but the committer of injury.—Ruskin.

There is but one thing you have to fear on earth or in heaven—being untrue to yourself, and therefore untrue to God. If you will not do the thing you know to be true, then, indeed, you are weak. You desert God, and therefore cannot expect him to stand by you.—Kingsley.

DIVINE LOVE.

Could we forbear dispute, and practice love,
We should agree as angels do above.

Where love presides, not vice alone does find
No entrance there, but virtues stay behind:
Both faith and hope, and all the meaner train
Of moral virtues, at the door remain.

Love only enters as a native there;
For, born in heaven, it does not sojourn here.

He that alone would wise and mighty be,
Commands that others love as well as He.

Love as He loved! How can we soar so high?
He can add wings when He commands to fly.

Nor should we be with this command dismay'd;
He that example gives will give His aid;

For He took flesh, that, where His precepts fail,
His practice, as a pattern, may prevail.

His love, at once, and dread instruct our thought:
As man He suffered, and as God He taught.

Will for the deed He takes; we may with ease
Obedient be, for if we love, we please.

Weak though we are, to love is no hard task,
And love for love is all that heaven does ask.

Love! that would all men just and temperate make,
Kind to themselves and others for His sake.

'Tis with our minds as with a fertile ground,
Wanting this love, they must with weeds abound

(Unruly passions), whose effects are worse Than thorns and thistles, springing from the curse.

—Edmund Waller.

TEMPERANCE.

A TEMPERANCE STORY.

Years ago, needing new pledge cards, I took my Bible to find something that would be helpful to those who felt just as you do. Choosing a verse, I ordered my cards. On Saturday evening I was to lead a Gospel Temperance meeting. The hall was up-stairs and the windows open. The music came floating down to us on the street, and a hush seemed to have come upon everything around us, as the words, "Home, home, sweet home," rang out clear and distinct. Standing under the window, his face upturned, was a man with unmistakable signs upon clothes, face and form of a drunkard.

I watched him, and as the melody ceased, his face went down into his hands and he groaned aloud. I put my hand on his arm and asked: "What is it, my friend?" He answered, "'Tis them words, ma'am, them words, 'Home, sweet home.' I had a home once, but I lost it, and everything else, through drink."

I invited him to go to the meeting. He thanked me and said his clothes were not fit; but I finally conquered, by urging that it was a long flight of stairs and he could help me up. During the hour my thoughts went to him, and my words were for him. At the close I read over the pledge and asked him to sign it.

"Oh! lady, I wish I could, but it's no use; I'd break it, right off, and I should not like to break your pledge."

"Listen," I replied; "here are some words just for you. 'I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not, I will help thee.'"

"Where did you get that? Lady, would you mind reading it again?" I opened my Bible to Isaiah 41: 13. He read and re-read the verse, then said anxiously: "You see how my hand trembles, lady; do you suppose I could write my name if God held my hand?"

"Oh! yes, I am sure you could."

"Do you s'pose I'd ever take another glass of liquor if God held my hand?"

"Never, unless you took your hand out of the Lord's. He never lets go of any one."

A new hope came into his eyes and a manliness to his face as, straightening himself up, and holding out his right hand, he exclaimed: "I've tried a good many times alone; now, here goes for God and me, and we will see what we can do."

His name went down upon the pledge, and we knelt, asking God's help and strength. That was years ago and he has kept his pledge. My friend, will you sign it to-day, and ask God to hold your right hand? May the Lord bless and keep you.—Mrs. J. K. Barney, in the Gospel Letter.

WHAT THEY THINK.

"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink!" (Habakkuk)—unless he hold a special tax stamp. (Internal revenue department U. S. government)

Prohibitory legislation, national and state, can only be permanently secured through the agency of a political party making this its central idea.—Mrs. J. Ellen Foster.

The conduct of some men, at every election, reminds one of these lines from Lowell:

"Their masters can cuss 'em, an' kick 'em, an' wale 'em,
And they notice it less than the ass did Balaam."

Josh Billings said: "Cider may be a good temperance drink, but I can get so drunk on it that I can't tell one of the Ten Commandments from a by-law of a base-ball klub."

Prohibition is not the policy of the Republican party. Every national Republican convention before which the question of prohibition has been presented, has peremptorily refused to adopt it.—Indianapolis, Ind., "Right and Freedom," official organ of the saloon-keeper's association, Oct. 22, 1892.

I want you to remember that a saloon is as national as a national bank, as lawful as a public school. I can seem to see upon the face of the rags of every drunken man a legend like that you often see on packages of whisky and tobacco: "Take notice. The manufacturer of this article has complied with all the requirements of the law, according to the statute, in such case made and provided."—John G. Wooley.

Seventy-five per cent of the people of this country are prohibitionists to-day, and in the power of God we will intensify the heat until the last man comes out from under the dress of old whisky politics, and comes into this new movement for the overthrow of the rum traffic of this country. That is what we expect to achieve. We expect to achieve that victory as we expect to-morrow's sun to rise.—A. B. Leonard, D.D.

Do you know what temperance people are? They are those people who stand down there by the side of the stream and pull out the unfortunates who are in the current. Do you know who the prohibitionists are? They are a party organized who go to the head of that stream and say to the saloon-keeper: "You shall not throw any more of our citizens into that stream of misery, degradation and death." Which do you like best, now?—Sam Jones.

Speaking of what would occur could the money that is wasted for drink be devoted to legitimate purposes, the Boston Daily Traveller says: "New buildings would be built, almost as by magic, and would be furnished with comforts heretofore unknown to people of moderate means. Thousands upon thousands of families would expend upon comfortable clothing fourfold what they now do, and other thousands upon thousands would thereby, in turn, have their own earnings increase."

There can be no compromise on the part of temperance men and women, there should be none on the part of any patriot, with this "delusion and snare" of high license. So far from being a step toward prohibition, it is a step, with seven-league boots, in the contrary direction. Wherever prohibition has been defeated it has been the saloon revenue that caused it. "It was the revenue argument that beat us," cried Miss Willard, from the field of conflict in Michigan. "It was the revenue argument that beat us," said Senator Colquitt, on the field of defeat in Atlanta. Increase that revenue and you strengthen that barrier against prohibition, and entrench the saloon in the mislaid tax-payer's cupidity.—E. J. Wheeler.

accompanied me in a visit to a Bro. Mattson, who conducts a mission in Norristown. It was thought that I might arrange to address his people. When I inquired if an opportunity would be given me to speak to his people, he replied: "No, sir, not on that subject." He said he had "given a great deal of thought to the subject of secret societies, and he knew they had nothing to do with religion. He only preached Christ and him crucified." How many are thus too busy to notice the societies that are crucifying Christ afresh!

I always like to go to Philadelphia, for I am sure of a welcome at the home of friends Edwin and Virginia Sellw. I met Edwin at his office, and he gave me a key to his house, so that when I returned from my meeting in Camden, N. J., at midnight, I came right in. The gas was burning and the "prophet's chamber" in readiness for the weary pilgrim. I was invited to speak in the Camden mission on Tuesday evening. After my address, the testimonies continued until a late hour. Several of the brethren spoke of the way in which the Lord had led them out of various lodges, and of the iniquities they there found. Bro. G. Anderson said that he paid $50 for six degrees of the Masonic lodge degradation, and found afterward that he could buy the same secrets, in book form, for fifty cents. He told how young men had been led from the lodge to the saloon by a brother in the lodge to which he belonged, who was the proprietor of a saloon. No lodge man appeared in its defense. The testimonies were all on one side. Four new subscriptions to our paper were here obtained.

Last night I addressed a goodly number who met in a hall on Broad street, Philadelphia. The arrangements for this gathering were made by Rev F. Edquist, pastor of the Swedish Congregational church. This is the third time I have been invited to address this people. Bro. Edquist followed my address with remarks in the Swedish language, telling the experience of a Swedish man who left the lodge.

I am returning home.

I expect that my next trip will be to Boston, to attend the N. E. Convention.

This is the season for work. Shall we not all aid in keeping the "lower lights" burning?

THE MINNESOTA STATE CONVENTION.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Dec. 2, 1892.

A special conference of churches of the Minnesota Christian Association convened in the Swedish Lutheran church at New London, Minn., on Tuesday evening, the 29th of November, 1892.

Pastoral duties prevented the attendance of the president, Rev. S. B. Sjoblom.

The devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. Prof. E. J. Warner, pastor of the church at Tripolis.

Rev. O. Estrom, pastor at Wilmar, was elected president pro tempore. Rev. J. A. Frost, pastor at Atwater, was chosen secretary.

The address of welcome, by Rev. L. G. Almen, pastor at New London, was a well-written discourse, in the English language, setting forth the danger to state and church of all secret societies, from Freemasonry to labor unions, inclusive. This was followed by a fitting response by Rev. W. W. Ames, of Menomonie, Wis.

All the devotional exercises and discussions of Wednesday afternoon were in the Swedish or Norwegian tongue, but all of the other work of the conference was done in the English language.

The congregations were large, and numerous pastors were in attendance. The Freemasons also attended and were publicly invited to participate, but they kept their "Masonic jewels," "silence and secrecy," intact. After one of the sessions had been dismissed, however, one Mason came forward and lost his jewel by (very consistently with Masonic principles) manifesting as much antipathy towards the Bible as he held against Anti-masonry.

Rev. W. W. Ames delivered the closing address on Wednesday evening. His theme was, "The Lodge a Standing Menace to the Church, the State and the Family." He sustained his position by relating his personal experiences in each of these three departments of life. In the denomination of his choice, the Seventh-day Advent Baptists, he said that he was threatened with the loss of his credentials as a minister of Christ among them if he bore testimony against the lodge in their churches.

The whole work of the entire conference was directed to the one object before it, and there was the utmost unanimity of sentiment manifested. A desire was expressed for another convention in one of the large cities.

The following resolutions were adopted by the convention:

PREAMBLE AND RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONVENTION.

WHEREAS, The overwhelming importance of the anti-secrecy reform is but very partially realized; and WHEREAS, There is a deplorable indifference to the subject among the churches of the land;

Resolved, That we endeavor, by the help of God, to arouse the attention of pastors and members everywhere to the evils and dangers of the secret lodge system.

Resolved, That we recommend to all pastors favorable to this reform wisely and discreetly, but faithfully, to instruct their members as to the evils of secretism, and enjoin it upon them to do the same by their children, especially by private conversation and the faithful distribution of tracts upon the subject.

Resolved, That the bitter and relentless antagonism of secretism to Christ as the only way of salvation, should be placed in the foreground of our warfare against the lodge; and

WHEREAS, Freemasonry stands before us, as judged by its own writings, a system of false worship, the invention of wicked spirits and wicked men, and revived by a company of "pothouse companions," or saloon-loafers, in a London gin shop in the year A. D. 1717; and,

WHEREAS, This system of false worship has perverted the Bible to its purposes—the alienation of the souls of mankind from the only true God and Father of our Saviour Jesus Christ, by the substitution of a false religion founded upon the enormous falsehood invented by themselves about the Bible; namely, that during the building of King Solomon's Temple Hiram, its builder, was murdered, and after having been dead fourteen days and his body "in a high state of putrefaction," he was raised from death to life by King Solomon; and this fabulous resurrection is substituted by them for the real resurrection of our Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; and

WHEREAS, It appears, from their own printed standard work of the lodge, that no man can be a Master Mason without personating the fabulous Hiram of Freemasonry, whom they identify with the pagan names of the prince of devils—Osiris, Tammuz, Bacchus, "The point within a circle," identical with Baal-peor, etc., and going through a mock ceremony of death, burial and resurrection as to be personally identified with ancient forms of pagan sun-worship practiced by ancient heathen nations; and,

WHEREAS, The Apostle Paul has declared that we cannot be partakers of the table of the Lord and the table of devils;" (1 Cor. 10: 21.)

Resolved, That we obey the injunction of the Scriptures to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them," (Eph. 5: 11); and, furthermore,

WHEREAS, Secret societies, such as Odd-fellowship and Knights of Pythias, publish and proclaim the identification of the ritualism of their own and all other secret societies with the same ancient paganism upon which Freemasonry claims to be founded;

Resolved, That we disfellowship and discountenance all secret societies that have altars in their lodges.

Resolved, That we hereby express our appreciation of, and our thanks to, the church and people who have so kindly entertained this convention.

Resolved, That we express our thanks to the Eastern Passenger Association of Railways—The Great Northern, Northern Pacific, St. Paul and Duluth and Soo Railroads—for their kindness in conceding a reduction of rates to delegates attending this convention.

Resolved, That the Executive Committee be instructed to arrange for an annual convention, to be held in Minneapolis or St. Paul, in January or February next.

STUDIES IN THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

QUARTERLY REVIEW.—Fourth Quarter, 1892.—December 18.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him.—Dan. 7: 14.

3: 3. Points of Interest: The persecutor arrested; the heavenly vision; the blind made to see. Central Truth: Jesus Christ changes the heart and the life.

LESSON II.—Dorcas Raised to Life.—Acts 9: 32-43. Golden Text: This woman was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did.—Acts 9: 36. Points of Interest: The healing of Eneas; the death of Dorcas; Simon the tanner. Central Truth: Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

LESSON III.—Peter's Vision.—Acts 10: 1-20. Golden Text: Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons.—Acts 10: 34.—Points of Interest: The devout centurion; Cornelius' vision; Peter's vision; Peter's obedience. Points of Interest: Trouble from false teachers; the decision of James; their decision borne to the church at Antioch. Central Truth: God guides his people into a fuller understanding of the truth.

LESSON XII.—This Review: Selections from the Acts. Central Truth: God is guiding his church to fuller truth and larger conquests. Practical Suggestions: The duty and privilege of foreign missions. Progress, led by the Holy Spirit and the providence of God, is the life and safety of the church. Visions of hope, of possibilities, of ideals, are one method by which progress is made. God changes the hindrances and obstacles from men into helps for the upbuilding of his kingdom. The power by which the world shall be made better is the Gospel of Jesus made mighty by the Holy Spirit.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

Articles of incorporation have been filed with the Secretary of State of the Indianapolis and Southwestern Railway Company, which proposes to construct a railway from Indianapolis, Ind., to East St. Louis, Ill. The capital stock is $250,000.

The great natural gas war that has given the 12,000 people of Kokomo, Ind., free fuel and light for the last six months, was declared off and legal rates will be charged.

A syndicate of paper-makers from Canada has been formed at Montreal to protect their interests. Over twenty mills, representing several millions of dollars, are interested.

An appeal on behalf of the Chinese and protesting against the exclusion act has been issued by the Chinese Equal Rights League of New York City. The address is signed by Wong Chin Foo, secretary of the league, and an occasional contributor to newspapers here. The exclusion act is condemned as a "monstrous wrong," while the circular further says that the law is not only against the already defenseless Chinese, but against the principles and spirit of the Constitution of the United States as well, and therefore against the principles of a common mankind.

The pension report of Commissioner Raum, after summing up the records of the last year, deals at length with the pension disability act, and a comparison of the work done under the respective administrations of Harrison and Cleveland. On the pension rolls June 30, 1892, there were 876,068 pensioners, an increase for the year of 199,908. There were added to the rolls during the year 222,937 new pensioners and 2,477 pensioners previously dropped were restored to the pension lists. During the year 24,307 persons were dropped from the rolls. The total amount expended for pensions during the fiscal year was $139,035,612. For the present fiscal year $144,956,000 is appropriated. The commissioner estimates that a deficiency appropriation of $10,508,621 will be necessary. An estimate of $165,000,000 is submitted for the next fiscal year, but Commissioner Raum says this amount may not be large enough. Under the dependent and disability pension act 920,957 claims have been filed, of which number 403,859 have been allowed. The pension payments under the law up to Sept. 30, 1892, amounted to $76,494,443.

At Beloit, Wis., the anxiety of the saloon-keepers over the grand jury's inquiries into their illicit selling of liquor was well shown when it got noised about that Sheriff Hogan had come from Janesville with a large number of warrants. The sheriff found C. R. and Walter Robinson and Mr. M. L. Ryan, who went before Judge Bennett and gave bond in the sum of $500 on each count in the indictments, to appear for hearing next Friday. The coming trials create intense excitement, as the former trials in the police courts failed to secure conviction.

The Jersey tract of 5,500 acres, eight miles from Antioch, Cal., has been flooded by the overflow of the San Joaquin River, and the labor of reclaiming it will be great. A large crop of onions and potatoes is ruined, and the total loss is placed at from $40,000 to $50,000.

Internal revenue collections for this year (says the report) show that Illinois pays the great bulk of internal revenue taxes. The aggregate collections last year were $36,000,000, which is more than twice the amount of aggregate collections of New York or Kentucky. The 5th Illinois district still heads the list of district collections with a total of $21,000,000 for the year. Collector Mamer's 1st district is the second of importance in the United States, with a total of $11,000,000. The 5th Illinois district yielded $4,500,000 and the 13th Illinois district yielded $500,000. Although the State does the largest internal revenue business the commissioner reports that the State is one of the few in which no illicit stills have been seized during the year. In some States, such as Georgia, the number of illicit stills seized during the year has run up to 160. The number of cigars manufactured in Illinois during the year was 250,000,000, and of cigarettes 3,300,000. Of these the 1st Illinois district manufactured the bulk. The showing made by the Illinois districts is the best in many years. The increase in the amount of tobacco manufactured is very great, and this is largely accounted for by the heavy duties imposed by the McKinley law upon imported cigars and tobacco.

HOME AND HEALTH.

VEGETABLE DIET.

Man's original food was fruit; of every tree in the garden he was permitted to eat freely. This food, when ripened was ready for his use without dressing or cooking; and it is probable that nothing else was needed to sustain life; and if we could now enjoy the fruits of Paradise they would doubtless be ample for every need. When sin entered the world, and the very ground was cursed, man was then compelled to toil for his bread and cook and prepare food for himself. The herbs and grains, it is probable, were originally designed for the cattle, for whose ready use they are conveniently prepared. Roots and vegetables were well adapted to the use of certain animals which are fitted to dig them and eat them. When the deluge came and blighted and blasted all things, man was permitted to enlarge his diet and eat not only vegetables, but the flesh of certain animals. The Mosaic Law gave the same permission, but carefully defined the kinds of animal food which were to be eaten.

Doubtless there are growing on the earth to-day fruits and vegetables which would supply all the ordinary needs of man, if he could select what he needed from the whole; but man is limited by location and climate, and most men never see but a small proportion of the kinds of food which the good God causes to spring forth from the earth for our benefit. In some regions few fruits or vegetables grow, and in many cases people do not cultivate many articles of food, and fail to avail themselves of the variety which they might enjoy.

With too many the regular bill of fare is almost confined to two or three articles; and when these are not relished, then all sorts of spices, pickles and condiments are resorted to, to stimulate the appetite. There are people who have bushels of apples who never think to place one on the table, but gorge their stomachs and vitiate their blood with salted meat and fish, swine's flesh, and other unhealthful articles. The following extract will give some idea of various articles one may use with the hope of improving health, while they gratify appetite.

"Spinach is said to have a direct and healing effect on the kidneys and bowels. The common dandelion, used as greens, is excellent for the same trouble. Asparagus purges the blood. Celery acts admirably upon the nervous system, and is a cure for neuralgia and rheumatism. Tomatoes and sour apples act upon the liver. Beets and turnips are excellent appetizers. Lettuce and cucumbers are cooling in their effects upon the system. Onions, garlic, leeks, olives, and shallots, all are said to possess medicinal virtues of a marked character, stimulating the circulatory system and promoting digestion. Red onions are an excellent diuretic, and are believed to be useful in killing disease germs and warding off contagion; and the white ones are recommended to be eaten raw as a remedy for sleeplessness. A soup made from onions is regarded by the French as an excellent restorative in debility of the digestive organs. Other vegetables and numerous ripe fruits, eaten in moderation, cheat the doctor out of many a patient."

Many preparations of wheat, rye, oats, barley, rice, maize, and other grains are accessible and very useful. Unleavened bread, if properly made, is also exceedingly palatable, and so healthful that the Lord took care, by positive law, that every Israelite should know how to make it, and should be required to use it one week in every year. Doubtless they did use it many other times, as many people do at the present time, finding it more healthful, more palatable, and more economical than the fermented and soured article which is so frequently seen upon the table.

While the curse remains we must "eat bread" in the sweat of the brow; when we pass beyond this world, and Paradise shall be restored with all its fruitfulness and beauty, then we hear of bread no more; for those whose robes are made white, shall have a right to eat of the

HORTICULTURAL.

Why not manure and plow the garden now?

Clean up the garden patch, even if you do not plow it this fall.

The cabbage crop is short; if you have any do not waste them.

The best time to trim off strawberry runners is just when they start; but why cut them off at all? Train them to run in rows, or to keep them in hills.

Did you ever try burying cabbage that you thought too soft to be "solid"? If not try some this year and notice results. We assure you, you will be surprised in the spring, if your experience agrees with ours.

In burying cabbage our plan is to put a little straw on the surface of the ground and stand the cabbage on this, heads down, in double rows, then cover with earth till just the roots are in sight. Cover more as cold advances.

Vegetables of all kinds are a short crop this year. If you have a quantity of any kind make it take the place of the variety you would prefer. Do not make "Hog and Hominy" your sole (or soul) diet this winter if by any means you can work in vegetables or fruit.

Neglect of the orchard often causes a loss. An apple orchard in New Jersey, which had not borne a crop for six years, was trimmed last spring in order to allow the horses to plow the field for corn. The field was plowed and harrowed, but for some reason the corn was not planted. The trees, however, were heavily laden with fruit of excellent quality, which resulted from trimming them, and the cultivation they received.

DAIRY.

A Canadian cheese weighing over 22,000 pounds will be on exhibition at the World's Fair next year. And the entire building devoted to the dairy exhibit is only 95x200.

The exports of cheese from Canada have grown from 49,255,523 pounds in 1881 to 106,202,140 pounds in 1891; while the exports of butter have decreased 17,649,491 pounds in 1881 to 3,768,101 pounds in 1891.

What does it cost you a quart to make milk? At the New Hampshire Experiment Station they found that from their best cow it costs about one and one-half cents a quart, and from their poorest cow it cost more than four and one-half cents. Some difference!

Although it is generally well known that in time milk becomes sour if held within certain limits of temperature, and that it becomes bitter if held within certain limits, it is not generally understood what the effect of mere freezing is, although the general opinion is that it is harmful to fine flavor, and it is officially stated in the bulletin of the Iowa Experiment Station that it imparts a bitter taste.

LIVE STOCK.

Many weak lambs are the result of compelling the ewes to subsist on straw and other coarse foods during the winter. The old maxim that "a sheep can subsist on anything" should be discarded.

The best grain for sheep is oats. One pint of oats daily to each sheep, with hay and straw at the rack, will not only bring the ewes out in good condition next spring but the lambs will be stronger and more vigorous.

A boar that is constantly breaking out and roaming around the neighborhood is a nuisance, and if he is not effectually confined at first he is likely to acquire a habit of breaking out that will make his possession a burden to the owner all winter.

POULTRY.

In deciding whether we are to keep pure or cross breeds, we are to keep in view our peculiar aims. If the purpose is to obtain eggs, it is generally better to use pure breeds, because the most eggs are produced by those species which do not sit, and this trait is very apt to disappear in crossing; at least if not regularly preserved. As sitting and non-sitting breed produce a cross that sits in almost every case; two non-sitting breeds produce a cross of which by far the greatest part are sitters.—Poultry Yard.

Hard to swallow—the great, gripping old-fashioned pill; and that's not the hardest part of it, either. Your troubles are only beginning when you get it down. It's all nonsense. You can get more good, and without having to suffer for it, with Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. Not merely temporary good, but help that lasts. In a perfectly easy and natural way they cleanse and regulate the whole system, and keep it regulated. Sick and Bilious Headache, Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, and all derangements of the liver, stomach and bowels are promptly relieved and permanently cured.

They're the original Liver Pills, the smallest, easiest and best to take—and they're the cheapest, for they're guaranteed to give satisfaction, or your money is returned. You pay only for the good you get. This is true only of Dr. Pierce's medicines.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 Wall St., N. Y.

NEWS OF THE WEEK (Continued from 15th page).

The National Prison Association was in session at Baltimore. Many needed reforms in the management of penal institutions were discussed.

Colonel Thomas Henderson Boyd, editor and proprietor of the Morning Olympian, at Olympia, Wash., was shot and killed at Seattle Friday night by his wife, in her rooms.

At Creston, Iowa, of the numerous liquor injunction cases brought in the superior and district courts, the first contempt case was tried. Tom Debord was fined $500 by Judge Tedford for violating an injunction. Debord caused a sensation on the witness stand by admitting that he sold liquor, and charged the prosecuting witness, George Munger, with being a former partner in the saloon business.

The new whaleback passenger steamer Christopher Columbus, built for the World's Fair Steamship Company of Chicago, was launched at West Superior Saturday at the docks of the American Steel Barge Company. A large number of Chicago vesselmen and business men witnessed the launching.

Elizabeth L. Clover has instituted divorce proceedings against her husband, Benjamin H. Clover, Populist Congressman from the Third Kansas District. The cause set forth in the petition is extreme cruelty.

Considerable interest is manifested in a rumor now going the rounds that the New York's Central locomotive engineers have submitted a proposition which they wish the road's officials to adopt for their government in the future. The report goes so far as to say that the communication was in the nature of an ultimatum, and if the company refuses to concede the demand a strike will follow.

Six hundred Ann Arbor, Mich., University students had a riot Saturday morning, in which clothes were torn, faces badly battered, and insulting terms freely used. The trouble was the attempt of the Students' Lecture Association to charge $1 extra for reserved seats, contrary to conditions on which they were sold.

It is reported that the Carnegie Steel Company will close down all the mills in Homestead in order to repair the damage done to the machinery by the non-unionists. A scale will be arranged which every man will be obliged to sign before securing employment at the works. Tables which will be worked automatically will be put in the two beam mills during the shut-down, which will lessen the force in this department of the plant. In addition to decreasing the force it is said reductions in wages will be made.

Henry Landenslager, a single man of 40 years, went to police headquarters at Springfield, O., declared that he was the murderer of five persons, said he was conscience-stricken, and surrendered himself. All of his victims, whose names and the date of whose death are as follows, were poisoned, he said: Nora O'Neill, of McVeyton, Pa., and Barbara Kilcrease, Mapleton, Pa., in '67; S. Murray, of New Moorefield, Ohio, in 1872; John Landenslager, his father, and Mrs. Fox, colored, in 1876. He refused to tell why he poisoned the persons, and would not tell what he had used to accomplish his purpose. The man was at once locked up for safe keeping.

At Indianapolis, the publication of the fact that Judge Taylor had allowed the attorneys in the Iron Hall receivership fees aggregating $15,300, has created general indignation among members of the order and a meeting has been called, at which it is proposed to draw up a formal protest against such allowances and present it to the court.

An attempt was made Wednesday night to assassinate the Rev. Dr. Tomes, the Congregational minister at Lake Station, Ind., while the family were seated in their home. A shot was fired through the window, the bullet just missing Mr. Tomes' head and lodging in the wall opposite. It is not known who fired the shot.

The first lot of souvenir coins will be received in Chicago Dec. 10.

Below we print the official program of the Wisconsin State Anti-secrecy Convention. It foreshadows much of interest and importance in its proceedings.

A Denver dispatch of the 7th inst., to the Chicago Tribune, says that an inmate of the county jail at that city has confessed to participation in the murder of Chief of Police Hennessy, in New Orleans. He is a French Creole, but a member of the dreaded Mafia society. He was present when the murder was planned, and was with the murderers when the deed was done. He knew the oaths and secrets of the organization. His confession seems to be credited by the authorities.

But one of the convicted murderers of Dr. P. H. Cronin—Dan Coughlin—now remains alive. Martin Burke is dead; O'Sullivan is dead; and a large number of others more or less implicated in the crime of the dastardly Clan-na-Gael have also passed from earth. Burke died of consumption, and, like all of his fellow-criminals, left no confession of his connection with the Cronin murder. It matters little, however, for with extraordinary rapidity principals and witnesses are hastening on to a higher tribunal.

Notwithstanding the persistent opposition manifested by the secular press, the Roman Catholic clergy, and the "lovers of pleasure rather than of God" generally, to the closing of World's Fair gates on Sunday, a majority of the members of Congress which passed the law forbidding them to be opened on the Lord's day are manfully maintaining their decision; and it looks now as if there will be no rescinding of the statute at the present session. The only danger appears to be that the new Congress will be convened in extra session before the opening of the Columbian Exposition and undo the work of the present one in this respect. Christians have no reason to be proud of the elements that are likely to prevail in the Fifty-third Congress.

The catalogue committee of the World's Fair recently gave the contract for printing the official list of exhibits to W. B. Conkey, of this city. This concession has aroused the ire of the secret labor unions, which accuse Mr. Conkey of favoring non-union printers, and for this he is being terribly denounced. Furthermore, the Labor Federation intend to ask the public not to patronize that book, and threaten, if possible, to have the World's Fair closed, not only on Sunday, but also on every day in the week, with other evidences of the malevolence of the secret system. We are glad that this fight is to begin at once and so vigorously; for the sooner it is understood that private and public business is, and must always be, subservient to the labor unions, the better for all concerned. Now is the time to have this position tested. The public has a vital interest in it.

From E. M. Curtiss, of Bristol, Conn., we have received a local newspaper's account of the opening of the new Masonic Temple in that town. The description of the interior of the structure reads well, and is intensely Masonic. One thing is certain. The ornamentation of the lodge-room fully confirms the expositions of Freemasonry made by Ronayne and others, as to the Masonic emblems and pagan character of the institution. Men and trees we are to know by their fruits; Masons, by their grips, signs, emblems and passwords; and those who have read in our publications the dreary, blasphemous twaddle of the lodge know just how Christian and charitable is the fraternity. It is not necessary to pay the lodge from $25 to $50, and pass through a series of degrading rites, to learn that the best part of Masonry is that side of it which it turns to the public gaze, while all within is sepulchral rottenness.

Advocates for opening the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday include many lawyers, who know that a contract legally executed is binding upon both parties, and cannot be abrogated by the will of the party of the second part after he has accepted it. Congress refused to loan the Exposition authorities $5,000,000, as they requested, but gave them $2,500,000, with prospective gains, on the condition that they would close the gates on Sunday. This contract was signed by the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, ratified by President Harrison, and accepted by the authorities of the Exposition, who have this week received the first installment of the 5,000,000 half-dollars from the government. By receiving them, the Exposition people have fully confirmed the contract made with Congress. Who can annul it? It is a bona fide business transaction, into which theology does not enter, and will hold.

FROM THE WESLEYAN MISSION IN AFRICA.

BY REV. H. W. JOHNSTON.

Let me report to your readers that the blessings of God are with us here in Africa and we are rejoicing in the great door before us to preach the Gospel to thousands who say "yes, we done hear that there is a God, but we know nothing about him. We have just heard his name—no more." We are located in what is known as the Bombali land, a section of country inland about 100 to 150 miles from the west coast, lying just at the border of the Timbali mountain region, and is accordingly hilly, but fertile, and distinguished from the regions about by being covered with the oil-palm. There are probably fifty towns within a radius of ten miles of Robennso, where we have established. These towns are in Bombali land proper. There is an open door for the Gospel in not only these towns, but in all directions beyond the confines of the palm field.

There are many "Morimen," as the Mohammedan teachers are called, but they have not yet obtained much hold upon the country. In fact, with a few exceptions, they do not seem to be laboring to convert the people; they are here for mercenary purposes. Their chief business is to manufacture "sebbes," the popular name for the Mohammedan charms and amulets. These they sell not only to those who believe in Mohammedanism, but even more largely to their heathen neighbors, for a great price. As these "sebbes" are to all intents and purposes the same to the people as their own "medicine," or fetiches, we find that these Morimen are the worst fetich dealers in the country. A king or big chief will sometimes pay from five dollars up to twenty-five for a sebba to "mind" his house, or insure long life, or protect him from harm in war, and so on. To such an extent did I find the big men of the country here decked out in the gewgaws of Mohammedanism that at first I supposed they had all embraced that faith; but now I find that they have merely bought them for fetiches, and that they practically know nothing of Mohammedanism; and, even more, that many of the "Morimen" are so ignorant of their own religion outside of the mercenary features of it that they can only read the Koran from memory and can't explain it.

ANTI-SECRET STATE CONVENTION.

Hotel accommodations may be had at $1 per day. Let us have a reviving time on this great reform.

If we could only fill this country with missionaries, I believe wonderful results would follow. Recently we have preached in a number of towns about us, not only among the Temnes, but have also gone to some towns in the Tokah and Timbah countries, which are near us. Wherever we have gone the people hear the Word gladly; and at one town they were much stirred, and gathered about us and questioned us closely about the way of life. Now, of course I am not so sanguine a person as to overlook the fact that it is one thing to be interested in hearing a new thing, and quite another to be convinced of the truth of it; and, above all, this I know, not only from what others have testified, but from my own experience, that it is one thing to convince a man, and quite another to convert him. We have about us here a number of people that seem convinced of the Gospel, but they are not converted, just as multitudes in America, in the church and out of it, are convinced of the truth in Jesus but are not yet converted. But I do believe that a Holy Ghost revival will sweep these Africans into the kingdom just as surely as it does the American.

Dr. Pierson has well said that it is the plain, unmistakable duty of the church to preach the Gospel to every creature, and to do so just as soon as possible. What will come afterwards is not so plain; but if we fulfill the Lord's command he will make plain to us the next step. If I had the resources at my command, I would apply that principle to Africa. I would plant missions about twenty miles, more or less, apart over this country, reaching toward the Soudan, just as fast as the way opened. I would plan that each one of these stations should preach the Gospel in every village within ten miles of them, or until they connected with the nearest mission. Let every person as near as possible hear the story of redemption. Let this be done, the next step would appear. Schools, homes, churches would spring up as God indicated, and Africa would be redeemed.

We expect, if God spares our lives, to thus itinerate Bombali land this dry season, and also reach some of the Timbah and Tokah towns. If we had the means at hand, and the workers, we believe the Timbah country would open to us now; perhaps the Tokah also. I mean open for the planting of a station therein. Could this be done now, the regions beyond would probably open as fast as they could be occupied until even the Moslem Mandingo and Foulah and Sofa tribes of the real "Soudan" would open their towns to the Gospel. We will do what we can. The Wesleyan Methodist Connection is small in numbers and not as a rule possessed of wealth, but the last year has been one of cheerful progress, and our people are awakening to their duty toward the unevangelized of the earth. If we should attain unto a fair measure of giving according to our ability, we can with clean hands and a clean Gospel yet do much for this land. The "Soudan" mission, which is operating on the Rokell river to the south of our location, has taken on new life since the Christian Alliance adopted it, and we understand a number of missionaries will arrive soon to recruit the work. They have begun to establish stations at the head of navigation, and hope to establish enough stations this year to bring up their line to a point in the river abreast our location. The U. B. mission at Rotofunk and the U. M. F. C. missions of England are both extending toward the Mendi countries on the south; but how much more might be done if the American churches were fully awake to the work. The Lord redeem Africa, is our prayer.

THE GREAT UNORGANIZED.

BY REV. ALEX. THOMPSON.

Of star-dust, say our philosophers, the worlds are made. From the unorganized ever comes the organized. At the command of Jehovah, the atoms rush together, and there is a world. In society great unorganized forces wait but for a leader, to suddenly rush together, take form and substance, and become a wonder in the world of men.

It will not be denied that just previous to the Reformation there was a widespread, dissatisfied feeling in Christendom—a knowledge that the church was not only corrupt in what might be called the decencies of life, but had become a great sponge to absorb the earnings of the people. The star-dust of the Reformation floated in all classes of society before Luther appeared, and it needed but his fiery spirit and stirring words to make it rush together and form his Protestant world.

So also the elements out of which grew the French Revolution and the Reign of Terror had been for some time in existence. In the time of Louis XV., as Carlyle says, the far-seeing had prophesied, "After us, the deluge;" and when the proper time came it needed but the lion-voice of a Mirabeau or a Danton to call together the fiery social atoms that formed the French Revolution. What is the great unorganized of to-day? In a former article in the Cynosure, entitled, "Where Are the Men?" the writer showed that they were not in the churches. Since that article was written, all that I have seen or known has only gone to deepen the conviction there expressed, that the church of the living God has been practically forsaken by men. The present paper is to express my belief that they exist at this time a great unorganized mass, possessing the same characteristics, and wanting but the voice and beckoning hand of a great leader, to stand forth in one solid organization that shall astonish the world.

What are the characteristics of this great unorganized?

1. They believe the Bible in spots. Go where I will among the men of these northern towns (I mean those other than Catholics) I find this true: Whenever I press home the claims of the Lord upon them to publicly recognize him as their Saviour and lawful Lord, I am met with the statement: "There are some things in the Bible I cannot believe;" or, "I am not sure about it;" and I am at once in the position of a man trying to erect a great building on the treacherous quicksands. My heart sinks in despair; for I well know that there is no building to the Lord possible until there is a firm foundation of belief in his holy Word. I do not doubt that in some parts of the country what I say of the general unbelief with regard to the all of the Bible may not be as marked as it is in those northern towns, but I know that it is a characteristic of the great unorganized mass of men to-day.

2. Another characteristic is, that this mass is practically Universalist. If the great unorganized were to take form to-day as a religious organization, the first and principal statement of its short creed would be, "All good fellows shall be saved." To assert that common morality is not a saving force is to antagonize every individual atom of the great unorganized. If a man pay his debts, if he break no human law, if he be known generally as a good fellow, if there be any kingdom of heaven, he will get there. Salvation through works is indeed a corner-stone of that temple which is yet undoubtedly to rise out of the material prepared for it whenever the Master-builder shall appear.

3. The last characteristics of the atoms of the great unorganized are: An unloved Bible, a God not revered, and his church unappreciated. It is superfluous for us to state that the great mass of men (I mean other than Catholics) have no love for the Bible. In all this northern land it would be indeed a matter of surprise to find any man, who reads the Bible at all, who is not a Christian. Except what has come to them through the Sabbath-school and contact with Christian men and women, they are as ignorant of what the Bible is as if it were the Koran, or the Sacred Book of India. As a result of this there is an unreverenced God, for they do not know him. In these northern towns the saloons and stores are wide open on the Sabbath. As a day of rest, the Sabbath is of course observed, but as a day holy to the living God, the very thought would bring a half-smile, half-sneer, to the lips of the multitude. Of the atoms of the great unorganized it may be truly said: "There is no fear of God before their eyes, and no reverence for him in their hearts."

That his church is unappreciated, needs no words of mine to show. The churches supported so largely by missionary money, where men are more numerous than elsewhere, and where they have steady work and good wages, proves this, while their numerous and well-equipped lodges prove that where the heart is, there is the pocket-book likewise.

And now who is he who is coming in and tries to speak the word to this great unorganized mass of like atoms? And there shall stand forth another wonder of the world. That he is coming is as sure to the mind of the writer as the fact that his work is waiting for him—who will appear in the field and preach a gospel without a Bible, without a blood-atonement, without reverence for a holy life, and without fear of God or devil; who will promise to take every good fellow to heaven, if there be such a place, and in the meantime see that he has a good time here. When he appears, he shall be the god of this world—he shall be anti-Christ.

ROME AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The following are authorized and official utterances of the Romish press and priesthood. We leave the reader to draw his own conclusions:

THE ROMISH PRESS.

These public schools are a devouring fire and pits of destruction. They ought to go back to the devil from whence they came.—The Freeman's Journal.

Let the public school go where it came from—the devil. What we Roman Catholics must do now is to get our children out of this devouring fire.—Western (Chicago) Tablet.

If your son or daughter is attending a State school, you may be sure that you are violating your duty as Catholic parents, and conducting to the everlasting anguish and despair of your child, as if you could take your oath of it! Take him away. Let him rather not know how to write his name, than to become the hound and chained slave of Satan.—The Shepherd of the Valley.

The common schools of this country are sinks of moral pollution and nurseries of hell.—Chicago Tablet.

The public or common school system is a swindle on the people, an outrage on justice, a foul disgrace in matters of morals, and should be abolished forthwith.—N. Y. Tablet.

The hideous fetich, called the public school, is only an ugly idol after all.—Colorado Catholic.

THE PRIEST.

Unless you suppress the school system as at present conducted, it will prove the damnation of this country.—Father Walker.

I frankly confess that the Catholics stand before the country as the enemies of the public schools.—Father Phelan.

The duty of all loyal, God-fearing, Christian men (Roman Catholics) then, I repeat it, is to make common cause against this common foe.—Father Gleason, Oakland, Cal.

The public schools have produced nothing but a godless generation of thieves and blackguards.—Priest Schauer.

THE BISHOP.

To rescue these little ones out of the grasp of that monster—that popular idol, (the public school) is our work.—Bishop Hennessy.

ARCH-BISHOP.

Emphatically a social plague.—Arch-bishop Perche.

THE POPE.

Education outside the control of the Roman Catholic church is a damnable heresy.—Pius IX.

Public schools open to all children for the education of the young should be under the control of the Romish church, and should not be subject to civil power, nor made to conform to the opinions of the ages.—Pope Pius IX.

When I see them drag from me the children, the poor little children, and give them an infidel education, it breaks my heart.—Pope Pius IX.

Leo XIII. characterizes these schools as wicked, detestable, irreligious, etc.

THE CARDINAL.

A ripe knowledge of the catechism, minus Massachusetts education, is preferable to her education, minus the catechism.—Cardinal Antonelli.

The common school system of the United States is the worst in the world.—Cardinal Manning.

The catechism alone is essential for the education of the people.—Cardinal Antonelli.

We must take part in the elections. Move in solid mass in every State against the party pledged to sustain the integrity of the public schools.—Cardinal McCloskey.

PER CONTRA.

"Encourage free schools, and resolve that not one dollar in money appropriated to their support, no matter how raised, shall be appropriated to the support of any sectarian school. Keep the church and state forever separate."—Ulysses S. Grant.

"THE CONTINENTAL LEAGUE."

Fire fights fire—secretism opposes secretism—Gog wars with Magog—and between the two the truth of God and the best interests of our republic must necessarily suffer.

"The Continental League" evidently had its origin in the Romish church, to head off the influence of the so-called "patriotic" (Protestant) secret societies of the American Protective Association, Patriotic Sons of America, etc. The extent of these Protestant societies and their objects formed the topic of an article on page 3 of last week's Cynosure, and nothing more need be added except that they appear to be responsible for the birth and growth of this antagonistic organization.

"The Continental League, now in full blast in Chicago, is a genuine Clan-na-Gael under an American garb. Beware of them, Americans, or lovers of the little red schoolhouse." The following is from M. J. Butler's address to the League: "After cursing the various patriotic orders, the orator said: 'Under the guise of patriotism, this old serpent (Know-nothingism) has reappeared in a form fully as obnoxious and more detestable than before. Under the guise of patriotism, it seeks to deprive good citizens, patriotic Americans, of their civic rights, because they choose to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, or because they belong to a race different from their own. It seeks to nullify the Constitution and to render the Declaration of Independence a farce.'

"The Continental League is an organization of the people. It represents fidelity to American institutions, with liberty of thought and action circumscribed only by the rights of our fellow citizens. We believe in the public school system. At the same time, we recognize the personal right of every individual to educate his children as he may see fit in such educational institutions as he may select."

This secret organization, which no doubt contains numerous members of the Clan-na-Gael, is not to be trusted, but should be watched and opposed with all the enmity with which every such secret and suspicious combination is regarded. If we understand its object, it is this—to become, so far as America's interests are concerned, what the Clan-na-Gael is to Great Britain—a menace to her welfare.

THE CLAN-NA-GAEL OATH.

"I do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will labor while life is left me to establish and defend a republican form of government in Ireland. That I will keep secret the name and everything connected with this Irish brotherhood from all not entitled to know such secrets; I will obey and comply with the constitution and the laws of the same whatever they may be; that I will faithfully preserve the funds of this order for the cause of Irish revolution alone as specified in the constitution; that I will deem it my special duty and mission to promote and foster sentiments of union, brotherly love and nationality among all Irish Catholics; that I will not permit the nomination in any political caucus or convention of a person not pledged to the principles of this society; I will also give a member of this brotherhood preference in all matters of business, and will vote and work only for Irishmen for political office. I take this obligation without any mental reservation, holding the same forever binding upon me, and that any violation thereof or desertion of any duty to the brotherhood is infamous and merits the severest punishment. So help me God."

This oath the candidate is told to keep at the hazard of his life. Dr. Cronin's assassination in Chicago is a sufficient proof that this oath-bound society of Romanists means business. Is that of the Continental League any better?

W. L. ENLOW.

Brother Enlow is gone. This will be sudden and sad news to the many friends who knew him during his college life. He was a quiet, faithful, studious, Christian man, not specially remarkable in anything, except that he was always in his place and did well the duty assigned. After his graduation he became the editor and publisher of the Birmingham (Iowa) Free Press. This paper represented in his region the movement against secret societies. It was not an easy task which he undertook. The subscription list was not large; the money receipts were small; the friends of the cause were the earnest Christians of the region; the enemies of the cause were many, and enmity is generally a more active principle than friendship.

In this new field he steadily and persistently went forward with the work. He believed that secret societies were a great obstacle in the way of the Christian church. He hated them because he believed they injured men, and so far as his influence extended, it was exerted continually in favor of the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ, and against the substitutes therefor which men have invented, and which devils inhabit and wield.

He was expected to report on the year's work at the recent Christian Association meeting in Iowa. A letter was received from him by the convention, saying that ill health prevented his presence, and the letter was followed almost immediately by a dispatch saying that he was already dead.

He leaves a wife and one or more children to mourn his early departure out of this world, to carry on the work which he had begun, and to look forward to a happy meeting in the world to come. We can wish for none of those who go out from us a more devoted and successful life than was appointed him.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION BY THE MAFIA.

A dispatch from Cleveland, Ohio, December 3, presents the following statement:

There seems to be no doubt that the Mafia, that Italian organization of secret assassination, has a flourishing branch in this city. A drunken Italian, named Carizza, assaulted two policemen recently, after they had endeavored to persuade him to keep the peace. He stabbed both, and pounded one with a club. Then, in self defense, he was shot by Patrolman Hill. Later on he died, and Hill was arrested.

At the coroner's inquest one of the principal witnesses was a man named Jacob Zuckerman. Last night two Italians called at the house of Nathan Zuckerman, his brother, under the impression that he was the witness in the case. As he opened the door one of them fired upon him. They also shot at a neighbor of Zuckerman. The police heard the shots and gave chase, capturing one of the would-be assassins who was the one who shot at Zuckerman, but fortunately missed him. His name was Stafano.

When he was put in the patrol wagon to be carried to the central police station, Stafano took from his pocket a red handkerchief and tied it firmly about his arm, and when the police attempted to remove it, he struggled fiercely to retain it. It was thought by the police that the red band was a signal of some kind used by a secret organization of Italians.

Had they known that this red band about the arm was the emblem of the bloodthirsty Mafia—the signal of "sanguine"—they would have been thankful, perhaps, that the patrol wagon reached the central without the shedding of blood.

Late this afternoon Jacob Zuckerman was assaulted on the street by James Lauri, an Italian, 19 years old. He received one hard blow from Lauri's fist, and his thumb was badly chewed. The latter was arrested.

It has been denied that the Mafia existed here. From an Italian who abhors the murderous Mafia, knowledge of the order which is absolutely unquestionable has been obtained, if the red emblem of the "sanguine" were not sufficient corroboration. The Cleveland Mafia has a membership of nearly 200. It has been in secret existence for some time, holding its meetings every month on one of the busiest streets in Cleveland. Its members are assessed 50 cents monthly for the support of the organization.

At its head are three Sicilians, who were described as among the most astute and cunning of their race. A former employe of a Buffalo bank, which was patronized almost exclusively by Italians, who deposited their money therein, preparatory to sending it home to Italy, is a prominent worker in the Mafia. This man is known to the Cleveland detectives; in fact, they are now endeavoring to obtain evidence against him for absconding with almost all the funds of the Buffalo bank referred to. It is he who has inflamed the Italians to revenge the death of Carizza.

Two months ago, unknown to the police, the most prominent Italian anarchist in this country was here, on the invitation of the local Mafia, and addressed them in their meeting-room. His subject was the betterment of the poor man's condition from a Mafia standpoint. This man is a member of the New York Mafia.

From here he went to Chicago. The discoveries of the last twelve hours by the police have demonstrated the existence of the Mafia. Stafano is 19 years old. He has been in this country but six months. He is boyish in appearance, with an innocent sort of stare in his clear and very dark brown eyes. A peculiarity is his hair, which is red, differing from most of his fellows, and not of the orthodox shade for the color of his eyes. He professes to understand no English, and made unintelligible replies to all inquiries. He was taken into the corridor twice, and when led back to prison the first time, he gave vent to an oath in a vindictive tone, and in clear English. It was addressed to the policeman, for whom it was clearly apparent he had no love.

Stafano's companion of Friday night, who made his escape when the other was arrested, was the guide in the affair, it is thought, and conducted Stafano to the Hill street residence, telling him whom to shoot. Jacob Zuckerman testified at the inquest that he saw Carizza's knife. This was in rebuttal of Italian witnesses' testimony that no knife was used. For the giving of this testimony it is supposed that Jacob's life was desired by the Italians who planned the shooting. Jacob was not at home when the two Italians arrived on the premises, and Nathan responded to the knock. Nathan said that when he stepped out Stafano said to him: "You talk about Italian man; you talk about Italian man." Nathan responded: "No," and the shooting and narrow escape followed. It would be possible to mistake Nathan for his brother, and Klein, who narrowly escaped being shot afterward, looks very much like Jacob.

Stafano was bound over to the grand jury under $2,000 bail, and it was said the secret society of Italians would endeavor to get security for the amount.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

A lodge quarrel.—"Ancient Odd-fellows."—A remarkably benevolent provision in their behalf.—Secret labor union a factor in the No-license struggle in Boston.—A will never carried out.

It is supposed by many that the spirit of love and concord is as much a characteristic feature of the lodge-room as the opposite is of a country church choir, which, although making harmony for others, is apt to be a very inharmonious body within itself. A case which is now before the Connecticut civil courts contains some valuable information on this head. A member of St. John's Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons drifted into the poor-house in South Norwalk. The Masonic lodge in that town took pity on this poor brother, (though as the sequel proves, it was not of so disinterested a type as that shown by the Good Samaritan), and paid his expenses, at first in a private family, and then in a hospital, where he finally died. But on submitting the bill to the lodge of which he was a member, that body promptly repudiated it. The case then went to the Grand Lodge, which ordered the St. John's lodge to pay the bill; but they stubbornly refused, and their Worshipful Master Meade appealed to the Grand Lodge for a hearing, which was refused him. The contumacious lodge then passed resolutions reflecting severely upon the Grand Master, who at once summoned Master Meade to answer to a charge of contempt, both in accepting such resolutions, and in refusing to obey orders; whereupon Master Meade prayed out an injunction to restrain the Grand Master from deposing him from office. The latter entered a demurrer; and so the case stands, a shining example for the profane world outside to consider, not only of brotherly concord among Masons, but of their charity to impoverished members; for it is evident that this man would have died in the poor-house, if the Norwalk lodge had supposed they would be left to foot the bill.

In this connection an article in the East Boston Argus, on "Masons and Masonry," has a unique interest. I will quote one or two sentences for the delectation of the reader: "Masonry has seen the rise and fall of the Persian, Grecian and Roman empires . . . , and is to-day more flourishing than ever, and bids fair to endure even when time shall be no more. Why? Because it is founded on love; all creeds and nationalities bow before its divine origin Volumes might be written showing the fraternity of Masons. The order is founded on love, and will endure while love endures, and that can never die; for God is love."

Such talk as this, in the light of cases like the above (and far worse ones can be found by the score), ought not to deceive the most hopelessly verdant.

But while some are willing to admit that Masonic charity is often a very cold and unreliable thing, they have a fancy that Odd-fellowship is quite different. Such ought to read the testimony of Mr. Kidder, P. J. M. and Grand Secretary of the order in New Hampshire. He tells, in the Manchester Union, of a brother who became a member of a Vermont lodge, now defunct, and afterward took a withdrawal-card and moved into New Hampshire; but, although "he loves the order, and wishes the privilege of visiting the lodge in his declining years, he is barred out. "We are asked what he can do," continues Mr. Kidder; "we reply, simply nothing. When his card is out of date, in the nature of things under the law, he becomes an Ancient Odd-fellow, and may not ever be able to change his relations to the order."

This turning of their aged members out in the cold to starve—as cruel owners do an old horse—has struck some of the New Hampshire I. O. O. F.'s with a sense of incongruity; for the subject of receiving them as non-beneficial members was agitated from time to time, until about fifteen years ago, when the New Hampshire Grand Lodge passed a law that all such who were in good standing at the time their respective lodges became defunct might be admitted again to the order as non-affiliating Odd-fellows, by the payment of five dollars. And Mr. Kidder thinks it very strange that "not a single suspended brother has ever come back into the order under the provisions of this law." Think of it! A poor and aged Odd-fellow is kindly allowed to pay five dollars to the lodge—if he can scrape together as much—and in return have the privilege of once more joining the circle of his brethren, the organization meanwhile taking pains to assure him that this is all he need expect. He may die in the poor-house and be buried in a pauper's grave; he has no claim on their boasted charity. Wonderful, to be sure, that not a single "Ancient Odd-fellow" has yet seen fit to avail himself of such profitable and gracious provisions!

In the article on "Masons and Masonry," to which I have alluded, the statement is made that "a prosperous lodge, composed mostly of Roman Catholics," has not been an unknown thing in the world's history; and that Napoleon III. was not only a Freemason, but a Rosicrucian." Yet the latter died a good Catholic. Why does not Rome explain these inconsistencies?

The No-license question in Boston still continues uppermost in interest, but so uncertain are the factors connected with it that neither friend nor foe can safely predict which way the vote will turn. The cigar-makers are having a nice little quarrel with the liquor-dealers, because they persist in selling the cheap tenement and non-union cigars. A number of other trades are nursing a similar grievance, so that the unions are threatening a No-license vote; but as these ballots will not be cast for principle it is a very unreliable force for the prohibition side to rely on. Still it is an interesting complication of the situation. Meanwhile the liquor-dealers are not idle in view of the present crisis, but are holding secret meetings from which even the ubiquitous newspaper reporter is rigorously excluded, even going so far as to tyle their doors by stationing a guard outside, so that no one not a bona-fide member of the rum-selling fraternity may pass unchallenged.

Some of the good people of Medford, especially in the Congregational church, where Gen. Lawrence attends, are beginning to see how their support of him for mayor strikes an outsider. They must be extraordinarily obtuse if some of the criticisms on their conduct, made even by that part of the public press which is not committed to prohibition, does not sting like nettles. Gen. Lawrence is carrying on his business in direct violation of the provisions of his father's will, to whose credit it must be put that he made one late effort to undo a little of the untold evil he had wrought, by ordering that in three years from the time of his death there should be a wholesale demolition of the building, the vats and machinery sold, and even the land, never to be used again for the purpose of rum manufacturing. But his son, in defiance of his father's wish, still continues the business, and deacons and church trustees lend him the support of their names. Oh, the pity and the shame of it!

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 7, 1892.

No portion of President Harrison's annual message to Congress was read with quite as much interest by the good people of Washington as the paragraph dealing with the liquor traffic, which, truly and without exaggeration, portrays the situation precisely as it exists to-day, in the following language: "The District of Columbia is left, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the District, without any law regulating the liquor traffic. An old statute of the Legislature of the District, relating to the licensing of various vocations, has hitherto been treated by the Commissioners as giving them power to grant or refuse licenses to sell intoxicating liquors, and as subjecting those who sold without license to penalties; but in May last the Supreme Court of the District held against this power of the Commissioners. It is of urgent importance, therefore, that Congress should supply, either by direct enactment or by conferring discretionary powers upon the Commissioners, proper limitations and restraints upon the liquor traffic of the District. The District has suffered in its reputation by many crimes of violence, a large percentage of them resulting from drunkenness and the liquor traffic. The capital of the nation should be freed from this reproach by the enactment of stringent restrictions and limitations upon this traffic." There are no two opinions about the urgent importance of immediate Congressional legislation on this matter; but it is sincerely to be hoped that the evil will be met by direct enactment, and not by conferring discretionary power upon the Commissioners, who are in no sense responsible to the citizens of Washington for their actions, and who have shown in the past, as their successors may in the future, that they are susceptible to the powerful influences, political and otherwise, which can at all times be brought to bear by the organized liquor dealers. If Congress will persist in recognizing the liquor traffic by licenses, let it place restrictions upon it that are so plain that they cannot be misinterpreted, and let no man be vested with any discretionary power in administering the law. Administrative officials are not, as a rule, vested with discretionary powers where other laws are concerned; why should they be in a law that deals with a traffic which no one can deny produces more than half of all the crime and misery of the age?

President Harrison's recommendation that Congress enact a national quarantine law, and place additional restrictions upon European immigration, was very favorably received by the members of Congress, and already a bill has been introduced in the House, by Representative Rayner, of Maryland, for the better protection of commerce, and for the establishment of a national quarantine; also one in the Senate, by Mr. Chandler, of New Hampshire, providing for a suspension of European immigration for one year from March 4, 1893. Both of these bills are in the nature of precautions to prevent an epidemic of cholera in the United States next year, the opinion of the highest medical authorities, both in this country and Europe, agreeing upon the probability—almost the certainty—that cholera will again make its appearance in Europe in the spring.

There is no department of the government in which the people of all classes are so directly interested as the postoffice; therefore, Postmaster-General Wannamaker's annual report will be read with interest by everybody. It shows the improvements made, and recommends others. He believes that in the near future we shall have one-cent letter postage, and that free delivery and collection of mail will be extended to all villages and thickly settled country districts.

Senator Vest has introduced a joint resolution, which, if approved by Congress, may be far-reaching in its effect. It provides for the appointment by the President of three commissioners to confer with the proper officials of the five tribes of civilized Indians, now in Indian Territory, with a view to making such an agreement and arrangement as will induce them to take homesteads in severalty and sell the remainder of their lands to the United States.

At a large conference of Jewish rabbis, who are here from all sections of the country, in attendance upon the meeting of the "Union of American Hebrew Congregations," a Jewish organization, it was decided that the Jews should be represented at the World's Religious Congress, to be held next year in connection with the World's Fair, by some of their most distinguished members in Europe and America. *

REFORM NEWS.

THE MISSOURI STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

OAKLAND, Kansas, Dec. 6, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Doubtless our Missouri Christian Convention will be reported by our secretary, Bro. M. N. Butler, but I shall also send you a few lines.

Our Convention was not largely attended, and yet we had a very stimulating gathering, and one that will bear still more fruit. We count not by numbers, but by weight. There is Mr. Geo. W. Needels, Sr., in the work of genuine reform. You may count on him at five tons always. Butler and Chalmers came in with their tonnage, and the Convention was secured. The only regret was that there were not more present to hear the remarks, discussions, resolutions and addresses. But "discouragement" must not be found in our vocabulary.

Bro. Butler remarked that before the war a half dozen or more Abolitionists would get together and formulate resolutions that shook the continent. God grant that in these Conventions which we are holding in the different States we may formulate resolutions and devise plans that will shake the continent on this question. Why not?

We commend our resolutions to the careful and prayerful consideration of all reformers—all who have at heart the realization of the highest Christian life and character, and who are earnestly committed to securing better conditions for that realization.

The Convention, before adjourning, ordered 10,000 copies of these resolutions to be printed. We purpose scattering them. We are not going to hide them in a corner. If they are erroneous, if they are too strong, too radical, too sweeping, or if they are too weak or too indefinite, let us have them corrected.

The keynote of the Convention, in prayer, in song, in Bible-reading, in remark, in address, and crystallized in resolution, was the oneness of Christian reform. Great mistakes have been made in the past in carrying forward a desirable reform, and yet, at the same time, leaving unchallenged and unresisted evils that will from their very nature hinder and hurt their cause. Not only so, but in the past, and also in the present, reforms have been handicapped because those engaged in them have joined hands with those who, in other spheres, were engaged in abominable iniquities. Let the friends of true reform be on their guard, and defeat the maxim that "history repeats itself."

On the first evening, November 29, the writer and Bro. M. N. Butler addressed the Convention. I was only sorry that Bro. Butler did not talk to us longer. One is getting to headquarters for information on this subject when Bro. Butler gets on the floor or puts his pen to paper.

On the second evening, Nov. 30, Rev. Thos. M. Chalmers gave us a masterly address on "The Origin, Religious Character and Final Tendency of Freemasonry." To appreciate Bro. Chalmers' address, you must hear it. Having heard it, you will not forget it. He deals in solid, solemn facts from first to last. He does not trouble with gloves. Every declaration, though it be as stern as fate, yet comes from the standpoint of the cross of Calvary. This must characterize all our reform work—the highest good of souls, the highest good of society, the highest good of the state, the highest good of the church, from the standpoint of the pierced hands and wounded side.

The morning and afternoon sessions were given to business and free speech upon these important questions of reform. The Convention grew in interest.

As is indicated in the resolutions, some conference was held in regard to establishing a weekly reform paper at some place west of the Mississippi River. This hinges upon the outcome of the monthly Free Press, published at Birmingham, Iowa. Since the death of the lamented Enlow this factor remains uncertain. Death levels his shafts at our ranks. Let our prayer be that others will come forward to take his place.

Bro. Butler will, doubtless, send in a more succinct report, containing our resolutions. An advance was certainly made in reform work in Missouri. There has been no Convention in this State for five or six years. Hence it was hard to summon our forces together.

Our Convention appointed the writer to convey our fraternal greeting to the District W. C. T. U. Convention meeting at Stanberry, Mo., 20 miles away, December 1st and 2nd. I went to Stanberry on the morning of the 1st. In the afternoon I was courteously given an opportunity to convey our greetings. I made a brief speech, closing by reading our resolutions to them and commending them to their prayerful consideration. The president, Mrs. Allen, of Bethany, Mo., made a brief reply. Of course, no concessions were made; but it is to be most earnestly hoped and prayed for that the National W. C. T. U., followed by the local unions, will establish a department for Romanism, and one for Secretism, as well as to have one for Narcotics, and one for Woman Suffrage, and one for Social Purity, as the Association now very properly has,

I hastened toward Topeka, to join Bro. Chalmers in addressing a meeting in the Swedish Lutheran church, in that city. We had a good meeting, worked up by Rev. J. W. Dill, pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian church of Topeka.

Yours for Christian reform,

W. C. PADEN.

Tuesday, in company with Josiah F. Beauchamp, I went to the State meeting, at Albany, convening in the Free Methodist church. As others will, doubtless, report the meeting for the Cynosure, I will only say that it afforded us great pleasure to meet Rev. W. C. Paden, Rev. Thos. M. Chalmers, and other earnest workers. Bro. Paden gave us a telling lecture, on Tuesday evening, and on Wednesday night Bro. Chalmers gave the most comprehensive and logical discussion of the relation and nature of Rum, Romanism and Freemasonry that it has been our pleasure to hear. It really maps out a new line of action, and widens this movement with all of us. If this speaker follows out his subjects, he will have a tremendous field and will command a wide hearing.

Hon. G. W. Needels is very anxious for a general reform newspaper at Albany, and made the following offer:

"When the Missouri State Christian Association shall raise $800, to buy and equip a printing office in Albany, Mo., I will deed said association the old Freeman building and the two half-lots, in lots 1 and 2, in block 5, in the city of Albany, Mo.

(Signed)

"G. W. NEEDELS."

THE RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

WHEREAS, Secret oath-bound societies are in profession and character religious organizations that teach salvation by human means, denying the need of a Mediator and of an atonement for sin, yoking Christians in forbidden fellowship, and absorbing time, money and effort that should be given to Christ; and

WHEREAS, Rome, in accordance with her unchanging principles, which have ever been considered dangerous to true religion and free and just government, is at present carrying forward an aggressive propaganda, seeking to destroy our public school system, and to secure government support for her own; and

WHEREAS, After seventy-five years of opposition to the rum traffic, that traffic is to-day more deeply entrenched in society than ever before, having gained the recognition and protection of government, debauched the consciences of voters, and misled them by minor and false issues, so that even the church is shorn of her moral power by the silencing of her pulpits against this evil, and because church members by voting with license parties are made partners in an iniquity that sends 100,000 men and women to hell every twelve months; and

WHEREAS, Evils are always related in essence, and must inevitably combine for common defence, and events prove that a widespread combination of this trinity of evil is now being effected, as indicated by these facts, viz:

1. John Wilkes Booth, the assassin of Lincoln, was both a Roman Catholic and a Freemason.

2. The public men of Mexico are nearly all both Roman Catholics and Freemasons.

3. The Jesuits of the 17th century joined Masonic lodges in order to restore Charles II. to the throne of England, and to reinstate Roman Catholicism as the religion of England, and the principles of Romanism never change. (See History of Freemasonry, by Emmanuel Rehold, a Freemason.)

4. The greater number of the saloons in America are kept by Roman Catholics, while the Protestant churches do not allow saloonkeepers in their profession.

5. It is a matter of common fame that brewers, distillers and saloonkeepers are members of Masonic lodges, as well as of the Roman Catholic church, and by oath the whole brotherhood is bound to aid them to escape the penalties of their violations of law.

6. By recent decisions of Roman Catholic councils (see those of New York and Baltimore) the Roman Catholic church admits to her communion such members of secret societies as go regularly to confession, and instead of being opposed in principle to secret societies, is a prolific propagator of these bastard false worship; now, therefore,

Resolved, 1. That the movement against Rum, Romanism and Secretism is one movement, the greatest crusade of the ages, and cannot be effectively prosecuted in a divided form; that we affirm it to be the bounden duty of all patriots and Christians to unite in active participation in this mighty uprising; that it is the cause of souls, the cause of righteous government against anarchy, aristocracy, and all manner of political and spiritual despotism, and the cause of Christ against Antichrist.

2. That we shall continue to seek the overthrow of these pagan and papal anti-republican and anti-Christian agencies by all lawful and rightful means, as lectures, sermons, the scattering of reform literature, and all other legitimate means of agitation.

3. That in the death of W. L. Enlow we recognize the loss of an able and true friend of reform, and extend to his family the sympathies of this convention in this hour of their sad bereavement.

4. That since the death of Bro. Enlow may leave the field without a paper west of the Mississippi, it seems expedient that steps be taken at once to establish a Southwestern headquarters for the publication of a paper and such other literature as the state and stage of the movement shall demand.

5. That we invite Bros. Gault, Butler, Paden and Chalmers to take steps to raise funds to purchase and equip a paper to be run in the interest of our reform movements.

6. That we express our appreciation of the grand work that the National Christian Association and Christian Cynosure are doing for the advancement of Christian reforms, and that we shall co-operate with them in every laudable effort for the advancement of these causes.

7. As Frances E. Willard, president of the World's W. C. T. U., Mary Allen West, editor of the Union Signal, Hon. Neal Dow, and many leading W. C. T. U. workers, have spoken out plainly on the lodge question, hence it is our duty to continue to press upon this influential society the vast importance of the relation of Rum, Romanism, and oath-bound Secretism and ask that they establish a department against Romanism and lodgery as giant evils linked with saloonism and intemperance.

M. N. BUTLER,

W. C. PADEN,

T. M. CHALMERS,

Committee on Resolutions.

Unanimously adopted.

The convention ordered 10,000 copies of the resolutions printed as adopted, for circulation at temperance meetings and other suitable gatherings, that the people may know of this important movement against the triple alliance of Rum, Romanism and oath-bound Lodgery.

M. N. BUTLER.

REV. M. A. GAULT IN WISCONSIN.

EVANSVILLE, Wis., Dec. 8, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—In estimating the progress of our movement, there is very much to encourage. The number of pastors who have a growing conviction that secret societies are choking the spiritual life out of the church is the most encouraging sign of the times. They say their people are not yet prepared for a lecture on the subject, but it is only a question of time when the issue must be sprung. There are indications that when the break does come, it will be all along the line. Although secretism is powerfully entrenched, and the large majority of churches still close their doors against the agitation, yet we can say, as Elisha said to the young man at Dothan when he told the old prophet that the enemy had surrounded the town, cutting off every avenue of escape: "Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." The Omnipotent God, and all his angels, are on our side, and all the redeemed saints, and the best of God's saints on earth are on our side; and when the battle is joined, there is no doubt about the issue.

The Lord opened a wide door for me to present the cause, last Sabbath, in the U. P. church near Janesville. It is eight miles out on Rock Prairie, and is now the largest U. P. church in the State. The full house, earnest attention, good singing, live Sabbath-school, and the large number of young people at the front, were truly inspiring. I had lectured here twice, but had never presented the anti-secret question. No N. C. A. lecturer had ever been here. I found their young pastor, Bro. S. G. Huey, absent in Illinois, and the people gave me a hearty welcome, listening gladly to my strongest presentation of the anti-secret question. Some of them said they would welcome an anti-secret convention here. It would certainly be a good point at

FROM THE SOUTHERN DEPARTMENT.

SOUTHERN MINISTERS WHO HAVE RECEIVED THE "CYNOSURE."

LOUISIANA.—I want to thank you and others, who have been so kind as to send so valuable a messenger to me as the Cynosure, which has been as dew upon parched grass. I am very poor in this world's goods. I hold a charge in the country, where the people work on cane farms; yet I feel encouraged to go on in the Master's cause, feeling that there is a better future for my people. The secret lodge has quite a hold on my people. Recently I saw in a parade, on the Sabbath-day, several young ministers, marching at the will of Odd-fellowship. Whisky, wine and beer-drinking is quite prevalent among my people; even little boys and girls, as well as men and women. If we had a temperance lecturer out here, among the colored people, I think it would do a great deal of good. This evil whisky-demon has not stopped among the lower classes, but has found its way to some of our pulpits. So you can see from this that one who opposes these evils must have quite a hard pull; but when I read what has been done for those whose hope was stayed on Jesus, I take courage; for I firmly believe the time will come when these evils will cease. (Rev.) E. D. S.

ALABAMA.—I don't want to be without the Cynosure. Our association convened on Friday. I presented and recommended the Cynosure. I found that one young man already had prepared to join the lodge. I think I convinced him. If I can get my people to understand the merits of our cause, they will love it. Yours as ever, (Rev.) H. J. C.

TEXAS.—I shall never undertake to get on without that blessed paper. It is indispensable. I think I shall get a few more of the Texas ministers, in the vicinity where I live, to take the paper in the fall. From reading it the last two years, I am 100 per cent. more against the lodge and other vices than I was. Yours, (Rev.) C. S. M.

MISSOURI.—I have taken the Cynosure from its first issue, and think it grows better and better. I wish I could do more for it. My heart is with you and all of my brethren in the work of the Association for reform. (Rev.) E. S. B.

SOUTH CAROLINA.—I love the Cynosure. I am no Mason nor Odd-fellow; only a preacher, 75 years old. I have been preaching since 1847. May God bless you. (Rev.) M. J.

ALABAMA.—I am having a hard time of it down here at present. Can you continue the C. C.? It is difficult with us now to get the necessities of life; but I would feel lost without the Christian Cynosure. I am standing for this important reform; yet not doing as much as I intend to do, by the help of God, as soon as I can have a better chance to deliver lectures, as I did in Louisiana. (Rev.) C. P.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND ITS DOWNFALL.

WORCESTER, Mass., Nov. 29, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Your editorials in the issue of November 17, "The Result and its Causes," and "The Campaign of 1892," are suggestive and timely. Familiar with the history and policy of the Republican party from its birth, I found, at least fifteen years ago, that it was dying slowly but surely, as it appeared to me, with the dry rot of its moral imbecility. Wendell Phillips said of it, that it had nothing to do, but to rot. Its cowardly, hypocritical course for the last twenty years on the great moral questions of the day has been driving thousands of its best men from its ranks, until it stands trembling and tottering on the verge of political oblivion.

As a national party, it has been especially unfortunate since the war, in having been largely a sectional party, with all the bitterness of the war ranking in the hearts of the Southern people. I have found within the last three years, having spent considerable time in that part of our country, that that one word, "Republican," was the red flag that awoke all the fight there was left, because it represents to the South the war, with all its crushing defeat. Hence, I believe, the sooner it is eliminated from our national politics, the sooner we shall hear less about a "solid South."

Whatever else we may say of the South, it is largely Protestant, and we need it as a moral and religious force in the councils of the nation, through the channels of a national political party, as we can never get it through the Republican party. We must, and I am confident we shall, have a political party in this country that shall stand for all that is best in our American life—the American Sabbath, school and home, protection for American interests in that way that shall result in the greatest good for the greatest number. This would include the reform for which you are laboring, as the secret orders of our country came out originally from under the monarchies and despotisms of the old world, where they might seem to have some excuse for existing; but they have really no business on American soil.

One of the fatal mistakes the Republican party has made since the war has been in becoming the party of the capitalists and corporations, with all their insatiable greed, shaping their legislation so as to protect special interests, and finally staking their very existence on the idea of protection for the classes against the masses, as laid down in what is known as the McKinley bill, hearing nothing but the chink of dollars and dividends, as was said of the cotton Whigs before the war. With all the blaze of eloquence between the two old parties during the last campaign, not a word on any moral question, but simply a dollar or two, more or less, one way or the other. With the election of either Harrison or Cleveland, as you intimate, not a saloon less is found in the national capital, or anywhere else in this broad land. Forty years ago the cry went out for a party with a conscience, to meet the encroachments of the slave oligarchy, and it was found; but when its chief work was done, it failed to grapple with other great moral and political questions that have been pressing to the front, until we find it side-tracked and its late leaders discussing re-organization, with new men and measures, thereby confessing to the world that they are politically bankrupt, and must go into liquidation. Out of this break-up will come the party of the future, I think, that will unite the best people of our country, North and South, East and West—a party through which the best Christian sentiment of our country will find expression; a party that shall build on the eternal principles of justice, equity and righteousness, seeking to defend every man and woman in their inalienable rights, demanding a free, intelligent ballot and an honest count, whether in Massachusetts or Mississippi; a party in which a man or a woman will be of as much account as a Texas steer, a Jersey heifer, or a Berkshire pig.

As you intimate, a commission of inquiry into the effects of the liquor traffic has been knocking in vain at the doors of Congress for the last twenty years; but if the hog cholera or cattle fever breaks out in a distant State, a train of Pullman cars will, very likely, be started at once, with a Congressional committee, to look after it, while thousands and tens of thousands of human beings are swept into eternity through the curse of alcohol.

A party with an enthusiasm born of heaven needs to sweep through this country; and if I am not mistaken in the signs of the times, it is soon coming, and may God hasten the day!

LITERATURE.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The Holiday Number of the Century Magazine, with its green-and-bronze cover, contains more than the customary attractions. If it depended alone for its popularity upon its numerous illustrations—art-gems, they may be rated—it would cater to many tastes and meet with great favor; but its literary features are also brilliant specimens of American talent. Illustrated papers are as follows: A Madonna of Dagnan-Bouveret; Picturesque New York, by Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer; Madonna, by Harrison S. Morris; My Cousin Fanny, by Thomas N. Page; Ringing the Christmas Bells, by Edwin H. Blashfield; The New Cashier, by Edward Eggleston; Benefits Forgot, by Wolcott Balestier; Jenny Lind, by Ronald J. McNeill; Cid Ruy the Campeador, by John Malone; Sweet Bells Out of Tune, continued, by Mrs. Burton Harrison; Leaves from the Autobiography of Tommaso Salvini; Impressions of Browning and His Art, by Stopford A. Brooke; The Mother, by Edward E. Simmons; To Gypsyland, continued, by Elizabeth R. Pennell; The Virgin Enthroned, by Abbott H. Thayer; The Balcony—A Drama of Three, by Grace King; The Annunciation, by Mary L. Macomber; Serene's Religious Experience, by Cornelia A. Pratt; War Correspondence as a Fine Art, by Archibald Forbes; Their Christmas Meeting, by Florence W. Snedeker. Other papers are as follows: Noel, by Richard W. Gilder; Seeming Failure, by Thos. Bailey Aldrich; Compensation, by John Hay; The Problem of Poverty, by Washington Gladden; The Effect of Scientific Study upon Religious Beliefs, by H. S. Williams; with Editorials, Open Letters, etc.

In view of the fact that Sir Edwin Arnold will very likely be the next poet-laureate, one turns with interest to his most entertaining article in the December Cosmo- politan on a Japanese Watering Place. The same number contains seven portraits of Tennyson and interesting views of his late home and surroundings. Thos. Gorman has penetrated the mysteries of the silent Trappists' monastery with a profane kodak; Murat Halstead discusses Varieties of American Journalism. Herrmann throws Light on the Black Art, and Theodore Roosevelt and Maurice Thompson each contribute interesting articles. A feature of the number is twenty-four portraits of Parisian journalists, with sketches of their work. A curious bit is found in the stratches of the double frontispieces which adorn the magazine—on one side the marvelous painting of The Conquerors, by Fritel, which attracted so much attention at the last Paris salon, and on the other The Conquered, by Anton Dietrich; in the one the heroes of war moving down the vista of the centuries in magnificent array between ghastly lines of naked corpses, the other the unfortunate of all times and lands flocking beneath the gentle hand of the loving Christ. The Cosmopolitan will mark its first edition of 150,000 copies—that for January—by the offer of 1,000 free scholarships. In return for introducing the Cosmopolitan into certain neighborhoods the Cosmopolitan offers to any young man or woman free tuition, board, lodging and laundry at Yale, Vassar, Harvard, or any of the leading colleges, schools of art, music, medicine, or science. They send out a pamphlet on application telling how to obtain one of these free scholarships. Publication office, New York City.

The Christmas number of the Cottage Hearth has a handsome holiday cover, and is filled with good stories and articles appropriate to the season. The opening story, by Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, is entertaining and in the author's best vein. Miss Deris L. Hoyt furnishes an Art Talk on Sandro Botticelli, one of the Italian Old Masters. Hezekiah Butterworth furnishes a Christmas story in verse, entitled The Old Stage Sleigh. One of the choice stories of the season is that by Amy E. Blanchard, entitled The Gift that Went A-begging. In The Tragedy of Gallatin Valley we are given a glimpse of the lawlessness of the early days in the far West. Edmund Kirke completes his account of A Day with a Great Frenchman. The story of An Unconscious Hero, as told by M. A. C. Willard, is a fine specimen of character sketching. Sketches from Life, by J. Torrey Connor, is followed by a brief article on Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, by John Oldham. The regular departments are crowded full of seasonable hints and suggestions. Two pages are devoted to an illustrated article on Furs: the Fashion in Skins and Manufacture. The prospectus for 1893, in addition to an unusually good line of stories and articles, announces that Eben E. Rexford is to begin in the January number a Floral Department under the title, Talks about Flowers. W. A. Wilde & Co., Boston. $1.50 a year.

The publishers of Our Day, edited by Joseph Cook and other superior writers, announces that in the coming year some important improvements are to be made in this excellent magazine. A photogravure of some leading representative of current reform will appear in each number; special attention will be given to every topic of reform touching the Columbian Exposition; Dr. Barrows will see that the great subjects discussed in the World's Congress Auxiliary and the Parliaments of Reform, more than one hundred of which are already provided for, are duly noticed in Our Day; the subjects discussed the coming year in Our Day are likely to be of even more commanding and permanent interest than ever before. Every effort will be made to give the periodical not only a national, but a cosmopolitan outlook. The whole income of the magazine will be devoted to the improvement of its various departments. Our Day reaches large numbers of college students, teachers, preachers, editors and other educated men, and is more and more quoted at home and abroad. The subscription price is $2.50 per year; to ministers and students, $2 per year; single number, 25 cents; to ministers and students, 20 cents. Published at the Woman's Temple, Chicago, Ill.

The Century promises much for 1893, and will undoubtedly expend much care and money in maintaining the high position which this magazine has attained in American periodical literature. In accordance to serials already begun, there will be the correspondence between Gen. Sherman and his brother, the United States Senator; The Cosmopolis City Club, a story of municipal reform, by Rev. Washington Gladden; The Poet Whittier, by Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward, with Letters and a New Portrait; A Series of Notable Women; The £1,000,000 Bank-note, by Mark Twain; The Growth of the Kindergarten System; Reminiscences of Jean Francois Millet, the painter; Personal Sketches of Indian Life, by Miss Fletcher, etc. Published by the Century Co., 33 East 17th street, New York. $4 a year.

MUSIC.

Two Christmas Anthems (words and music): "Christ is Born," and "Hail to the Day," are comprised in Numbers 485 and 490 of Fischer's Octavo Edition of Sacred Music for Festivals and Holidays. The first is arranged for soprano, alto, tenor and bass voices, by De Monti; the second, for soprano solo and chorus, by A. Diabelli. The words are in English and Latin. Price, respectively, 15 and 20 cents each. Order by numbers. Published by J. Fischer & Bro., 7 Bible House, New York.

LODGE NOTES.

A MASON AT SIGHT.

The ceremony of making a Mason at sight, seldom performed, took place at Springfield during the late communication of the Grand Lodge of Ohio. The following report of this interesting affair is thus given by the Gazette, of that city, of Oct. 19: "Gen. Asa S. Bushnell is a Mason. He was made one yesterday 'at sight,' by the Grand Officers. The deeply impressive ceremony took place in the private parlors of Grand Master Goodale, in the Arcade. Such a ceremony never occurred but once before, and the name and record is lost. Gen. Bushnell became [A Master Mason] without leaving the room. The right to confer this rests with the Grand Master, but its use is as rare as Kohinoors. The ceremony took place in the presence of all the Grand Officers, the local committee, Gen. Keifer and Hon. J. F. McGrew. Gen. Bushnell was visibly affected. He had had no knowledge that this honor would be given to him. It was done because of his eminent act of giving $10,000, at the critical moment, for the Home. The full work of the degrees was presented to the General in abbreviated form, he taking all the obligations, and made acquainted with the modes of recognition. Gen. Bushnell was then escorted by the Grand Master and other Grand Officers to the lodge room of Anthony Lodge, where he witnessed the workings of the Master's degree in full, the Postulant being Frank Whitely. "By united action of Anthony Lodge, Gen. Bushnell was thereupon made an honorary member, and made an eloquent address of fraternal acceptance. It is understood that Clark Lodge will follow the example. Gen. Bushnell is a Mason, and is recognized, welcomed and honored as such."

LEGION OF HONOR.

Pennsylvania had 6,108 members June 30, 1892. Average age, 37; paid to Benefit Fund during year, $377,151.51; received on death claims, $317,500. That State is the second in membership; Massachusetts following, with 6,043 members, expects to hold second place Dec. 31.

XEROPHAGISTS.

The meaning of this name and whence it came is thus stated by Notes and Queries: "Pope Clement XII. having issued a bull forbidding the practice of Freemasonry, the Masons of Italy, who continued to meet, for the purpose of avoiding the penalties of the bull called themselves Xerophagists. The word means dry livers—persons who do not drink—and they adopted the title because they introduced something like the principle of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks into the institution. The title and the principle have since become obsolete."

A TABOO.

The Knights' Sword and Helmet prints the following: The following appeared in the Burlington Gazette of Aug. 4: "Catholics who belong to the Order of Knights of Pythias are exercised over a decision affecting the Fort Dodge K. P. Lodge, of which about one-half the members are Catholics. In response to a personal letter from C. F. Gemmett, the two Iowa Catholic prelates, Bishops Cosgrove and Hennessey, have written letters declaring that the Knights of Pythias Order is condemned by the church, in common with all secret societies. They say that no Catholic should be allowed to join the order. The penalty for so doing or maintaining membership is excommunication."

—The London Freemason refers to an unusual circumstance that took place a few weeks ago in the London district. At a lodge meeting a candidate was about to be initiated, when it was found he was an agnostic. The candidate was thereupon requested to retire, and the ceremony was stopped.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1892.

Among the various stratagems of Satan in opposition to God and holiness, and for the purpose of destroying the souls of men, the institution of speculative Freemasonry holds a pre-eminent rank.—LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG, Founder of the first temperance society.

MASONIC WEAKNESS.

The weakness of Freemasonry lies in the futility of its great pretensions—in foisting itself upon the public attention as a remarkably wise and benevolent institution. In this respect it resembles the dude who travels on his good looks and good taste in dressing. Intelligence, morality, talent and usefulness are secondary with him. Masonry prates of itself as "a life for God, for the state, for the brethren, honor, fidelity, benevolence. Its magic words are wisdom, peace, strength, concord, truth, beauty;" and so on, ad infinitum. A man must indeed be a Mason at heart if he can find in the Christless rituals of the forty-nine degrees of Freemasonry, in its lectures, in its teachings, any of the foregoing attributes. The true Christian will only find in Freemasonry a revival of pagan mysteries, brutal obligations, mercenary benevolence, clannishness, and a system of morality that permits a Master Mason to break the seventh commandment with impunity, if he does so among those outside of the fraternity.

Any system, secret or otherwise, that has thus to play the hypocrite with the world and practice faith with its own membership upon compulsion, must of necessity manifest weakness. It may rear majestic temples, it may count its adherents by millions, yet without Christianity, without obedience to God, without modesty and ingenuousness, the whole army of them, from entered apprentices to grand inspector-generals, are no stronger than the 185,000 Assyrians whom the angel of the Lord destroyed in one night because they threatened to exterminate the armies of God. (2 Kings 19: 35.) Their strength is weakness.

Freemasonry is weak, inasmuch as its boasted secrecy is no secrecy any longer. An Anti-mason, who has never seen the inside of the fraternity's lodge-room, can describe it thoroughly; he can greet a Freemason with the signs, passwords and grips of the fraternity, and, unsuspected, can receive the proper sign and words in return. What, then, becomes of the boasted strength (which is secrecy) of the fraternity, and of what avail are tyled doors, locks and bars? What they know we know: what they do—we don't, because we know how evil is the obligation which compels them to do what we abhor and detest. Their strength is weakness; their weakness is our strength in the reforms which we cherish.

KNIGHT TEMPLARISM AND MASONRY.

Probably nothing has done so much to mislead the public mind as to the un-Christian and blasphemous character of Freemasonry as the Knight Templars' degree. Manifestly, this was the purpose of its institution. As every Knight Templar is a Mason, and as the Knight Templar not only recognizes Christ, but swears, as did the Knights of the twelfth century, to draw his sword in defense of the Christian religion, it is held that Masonry cannot be anti-Christian, or it would not lead up to such a degree.

But the absurdity of this reasoning is apparent when we consider that only a small percentage of Masons are Knight Templars, and that it actually does not lead up to this degree, and it is not in the regular series of the Scottish Rite. But suppose all Masons were Knight Templars; it would not change the un-Christian character of the system, or relieve the professed Christian Mason from his inconsistency. It is not required that all a man's statements shall be lies in order to make him a liar, or that he shall constantly be engaged in stealing in order that he be accounted a thief. A very small percentage of these acts of wickedness, if unrepented of, will fix the reputation of him who practices them. So, too, a rejection of Christ in the worship of the degrees of the lodge and of the chapter cannot be atoned for by his acknowledgment in the commandery. If the candidate ceased to be a Mason when he became a Knight, there might be some ground for such an idea. But he does not. He still belongs to the lodge and the chapter, and is still bound by their covenants. As well might a man claim that since he tells forty truths to one lie, therefore he is no longer a liar, as to hold that because he only sometimes rejects Christ in his worship, and he sometimes confesses him, therefore he is a faithful confessor. We do not reason this way in ordinary affairs. Christ has said that "he that shall deny me before men, him will I deny before my Father in heaven." To exclude his name from our worship and take it out of his Word is to deny him. All subsequent conduct, that comes short of repentance and confession, can never secure acceptance with God.

But we want to call attention to the un-Christian nature of the Knight Templar's oath. He swears that he will draw his sword in defense of the Christian religion. This was what Peter did in his mistaken zeal for his divine Master. If there was ever a just occasion for war, that was one. Never in the history of the world was so cruel an attack made on so holy a person. Never had there been such adequate means of defense as was at the disposal of Christ and his followers. But Jesus said: "Put up thy sword. They that take the sword shall perish by the sword." Christ said to Pilate: "My kingdom is not of this world. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered unto the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." (John 18: 16.)

The kingdom of heaven neither needs such defense nor can be defended by the swords of men.

There is no instance of such fighting by the disciples of Christ, or in the earlier period of the church; and all history shows that religious wars have always been disastrous to Christianity. Not only is there no sort of occasion for men to draw their swords in defense of Christianity, but to do so is to commit the same sin that Peter did when he cut off the ear of the servant of the high priest. Christ-like conduct is what is required of his people. There is no authority for any other than passive resistance. Even Nero was to be obeyed in all things not forbidden by the Word of God, and only to be resisted as Christ resisted Pilate.

HERESY IN THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The pending trials of Dr. Briggs, of Union, and Dr. Smith, of Lane, Theological Seminaries recall the great contention in the Presbyterian body of 1836-37, which rent it asunder and made what, up to 1871, were called the "Old School" and "New School" Presbyterian churches, but each of which called itself THE Presbyterian church. Finally they saw—that to others was quite obvious—that all along they had been teaching the same essential truths, and that there was no just occasion for their separation. Since 1871 there has been general, if not perfect, peace.

This controversy is thought to involve something more than mere questions of the interpretation of the Scriptures, but, rather, the credibility of the Scriptures themselves.

Whatever may be the conclusion of these trials, two things will be quite apparent: (1) That division on account of honest differences of Scriptural interpretation are uncalled for; and (2), that the remedy for false doctrine is greater devotedness to the evangelization of a world lying in wickedness.

IN THE NAME OF THE LORD.

The apostle admonishes us (Col. 3: 17), that "whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." It is certain that no one understandingly went into the Masonic or Odd-fellows' lodge "in the name of the Lord Jesus." Institutions that exclude his name from their ritual, and from their prescribed forms of prayer, cannot be Christian institutions; and those who engage in true Christian worship cannot join them in the name of our Lord. True, the candidate for Masonry enters "in the name of the lord," but not "in the name of the Lord Jesus."

There are other institutions that are professedly Christian, and, we trust, are mainly so, that tolerate practices that can by no means be undertaken in the name of Christ.

We copy from the Young Men's Era, an organ of the Y. M. C. A., an account of the celebration of Hallowe'en in the Y. M. C. A. building at Minneapolis: "By actual count there were 477 crowded to witness the sport. The exercises commenced at 8 P. M., and consisted of a regular clap-drill, with 100 to 125 young men. This was followed by the regular Hallowe'en program, which included a sack-race, a chicken fight, and bobbing for apples, an apple race, a three-legged race, and climbing the greased pole. Everybody who came enjoyed themselves. It is estimated that from 7 to 10 o'clock there were between 700 and 800 people present."—Y. M. Era, Nov. 17.

Surely this was not "in the name of the Lord Jesus," nor did it tend to his honor. It drew a crowd and was "as good as a circus;" but was even more demoralizing. When will Christian people be content with Christian methods to do Christian work?

THE DEATH OF CARDINAL LAVIGERIE.

The recent death of Mgr. Lavigerie, commonly known as "the Black Cardinal," calls attention to the greatness, as well as the beneficence, of his work, and illustrates the undeniable fact that, together with all the absurd teachings, the evil methods and anti-republican influences of the Roman Catholic priesthood, there is, in many instances (as in the case of this distinguished prelate), a devotedness to the interests of suffering, benighted and oppressed humanity, and such extended, untiring efforts for their temporal and spiritual well-being, as scarcely find a parallel in the Protestant world.

Lavigerie, who finally became a cardinal, was bishop of Algeria, and was the most earnest and efficient of all European laborers for the suppression of the internal African slave trade. Nor was his influence on European affairs less enlightened and patriotic. His influence over the pope led to his recognition of the French republic as the legitimate government, and was a death-blow to monarchical pretensions in that country. Such an ex cathedra declaration in favor of free government is likely to compel a changed attitude of the Roman priesthood towards republican institutions all over the world.

It is believed that Cardinal Lavigerie was so far in sympathy with Protestantism that he deprecated all strife, and desired that all Christian missionaries should work together for the redemption of Africa. It was a mistake, which he shared with many of his Protestant co-laborers, but which he alone had the courage to carry out, when he thought he might evangelize Africa by the aid of the "Armed Brotherhood of the Sahara," who were expected to combine Christian instruction with military science, and both fight and teach, as occasion required. Such was not the example of Christ and his apostles. They "overcame by the blood of the Lamb and the word of their testimony," and "they loved not their lives unto the death." Rev. 12: 11. While we abate nothing in our abhorrence of the false pretensions and misleading teachings of Romanism, we realize that in the death of this distinguished prelate the world, but especially Africa, has suffered an irreparable loss.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S MESSAGE.

President Harrison's last annual message to Congress was delivered last week. While most of it does not lack public interest, there are particular passages in it that properly merit mention. Of course, as the head of an administration of which was born the McKinley tariff law, the President maintains the alleged benefits of the Republican doctrine of protection to home industry. In support of his position, he presents an array of figures, showing the growth of industry, population and wealth during thirty years past, and insists that all the increase in national prosperity in that period is due to the policy of protection. Prior to the beginning of those thirty years, he might have told us, the country enjoyed a very flattering degree of social, commercial, and financial progress and prosperity, even at a period when a tariff for revenue only was considered sufficient—when American vessels were engaged in a world-wide commerce, and our flag dotted every sea. Since the era of protection began our commerce with foreign nations has been principally transacted in foreign vessels, and the stars and stripes have become a curiosity in foreign waters.

The message is worth reading, if only for its recapitulation of the events transpiring in Mr. Harrison's administration. They cover a large number of operations very creditable to us as a nation, with others that are quite otherwise, including the renewal of the Chinese Exclusion act. There are also several very palpable omissions in our national legislation, but for these the President is not directly responsible.

On one point of proposed legislation which he commends, he will have the sympathy and support of all right-minded citizens. In order to prevent the coming of cholera and to improve the character of our foreign population, he recommends the adoption of such measures as will serve to check undesirable immigration—to keep out of this country the uncanny paupers and criminals that have been flocking here without discrimination or hindrance—continually swelling the dirty pool of partisan politics by their votes and tending to the deterioration of morality and honest industry. It is right that the United States should be the refuge of the oppressed of other nations, but it is not proper to contaminate our communities with the vices which are imported with the bulk of our immigration.

What we need is a class of legislators and legislation upon whom we can depend for patriotism, honesty and the progress of Christianity. Can we have them? The prospect is not as hopeful as we could desire, but prayer and obedience to God will do much to offset the schemes of unscrupulous partisan leaders. Let us pray and vote in that direction always.

WHEATON COLLEGE.

This long-established institution—"a school for men and women"—at Wheaton, Ill., is now closing the largest and best fall season's work that it has yet done. The number of students has been over 225. They have been, as is usual, a wide-awake and devoted band of young men and women.

Prof. H. A. Fischer has been released from class work for the year, that he may assist President Blanchard in the financial portion of his duty. The effort to raise $100,000 during the year progresses favorably. There is one subscription of $10,000, two of $1,000 each, and other smaller sums, aggregating $15,000. Mr. Geo. P. Bent has just given a beautiful concert grand piano to the college, for the parlor.

Prof. A. R. Crook, Ph. D., is an enthusiastic teacher.

The winter term, as appears elsewhere, opens January 3. Persons desiring further information may address the president. We cordially commend the college to our readers.

—We are promised a good report of the proceedings of the New England District Convention for next week's Cynosure.

—Rev. W. I. Phillips, Treasurer and Field Secretary of the National Christian Association, left on Thursday last for Washington and Boston. At the latter city he expects to participate in the proceedings of the New England District Anti-secrecy Convention on the 14th and 15th inst.

—We are prepared to send to new subscribers, for $2, in advance, the Cynosure for one year, and a copy of Rev. Dr. Carradine's excellent book—"A Journey to Palestine"—which sells for $1.50, both postage free. This is one of the best offers that we have yet made. The book is one to interest and instruct any household. Send in subscriptions at once.

—In connection with our own anti-secrecy literature, we will send any miscellaneous or gift-book to our readers (the money to be sent with the order) at 20 per cent. (one-fifth) less than the regular prices of such publications. This offer will remain open all this month of December, and will afford an excellent opportunity to obtain holiday books at a very reasonable rate.

—On pages 2 and 3 of last week's Cynosure, we gave place to an article detailing the persecution of a colored minister of the Gospel in Arkansas, on account of his opposition to secret societies. Since its publication we have received another note from him, in which he says that one of the Master Masons who was on the committee of secretists to run him out of town has applied for baptism and membership in our colored brother's church. Another, formerly an Odd-fellows' "grand scribe," has also been baptized and joined the same congregation. The pastor adds: "I baptized 75 last Sunday, and have 10 more" awaiting the administration of the ordinance. Who says that the work of the N. C. A. in the South is not worthy of a liberal support? Will our readers give the subject some earnest thought?

—Attention is invited to the letters of colored pastors printed on pages 5 and 6 of this number of the Cynosure, under the head of "From the Southern Department." These faithful men are readers of the Cynosure, through the free-will offerings of Christian anti-secrecy reformers, and, as we have reason to believe, are also doers of the Word. The work in the South among the colored people is very important, and is yielding the fruits of righteousness in drawing them from the lodges, or persuading them not to enter those Christless institutions. As the fund intrusted to the N. C. A. for this purpose accrues from the liberality of those whose interest extends to the pocket as well as the hearts of those who favor our reform, contributions for it may be sent to Rev. W. I. Phillips, Treasurer, 221 West Madison street, Chicago.

which to mass some of our speakers for a series of meetings. The large number of intelligent young people need the education and awakening that such a convention would give them. As a brother said to me recently, there are none of our church papers, and there are few of our pulpits, that give a sufficient sound on this question to warn our young people of the danger.

At Janesville I found Bro. and Sister Stevens still alive and ready to afford me hospitality as in years past. He is in feeble health, leaving the burden of responsibility upon her; yet she was ready to renew for the Cynosure, and give a contribution besides. At Delavan I found kind entertainment at the home of Washington Chesebro. They feel a special interest in the cause, and for forty years have testified here against secret organizations. It was his uncle, Nicholas G. Chesebro, who was W. M. of the Canandaigua lodge, and the leading actor in the abduction, on Sept. 10, 1826, of William Morgan. Years ago the State Anti-secret Convention met at Delavan, and the Congregational church ruled secret society members out. But they have since rescinded this rule. Secretists have come in, and the church will not now be opened for lectures on this subject. Bro. Parish, and others of the old guard, here, have joined the church triumphant. It saddens one's heart, in visiting these old anti-secret battle-grounds, to find so many of the old veterans gone.

The next evening I lectured in the Wesleyan Methodist church, at Tibbits, formerly called the Sugar Creek church. I was met at Elkhorn by Bro. O. S. Davis, who is now pastor at Tibbits. It was a pleasure again to meet and spend a night at the home of this brother, in whose church at West Union, Ia., I had lectured years ago. Here, also, at Tibbits, the State Convention was once held, and Elder Ronayne worked the degrees. The Wesleyans are still holding up the banner, although their ranks are thinning as will be the condition of all churches like theirs in these perilous times, that stand squarely against these powers of darkness. But when the reaction sets in, and the tide of battle turns, there will be a glorious revival for such churches.

I lectured twice in the Seminary Hall at Evansville, before the Faculty and students, to an audience that would inspire any speaker. This is a flourishing seminary, conducted by Free Methodists, who have a strong influence in the town. The Christian influence of the seminary is doubtless the best in the State. Prof. Coleman and wife, at the head of an excellent faculty of teachers, are not afraid to have the anti-secret question discussed before the students. It was an inspiration to meet them, and also Bro. Coleman's father, who is one of the General Superintendents of the Free Methodist church and a veteran in reform work. I found kind hospitality at his home. I can most cheerfully recommend this seminary to parents who have children to educate, as a school where the most wholesome Christian and reform influences are thrown around the student.

REFORM WORK IN MISSOURI.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—On Friday night last I gave a Bible reading to a good audience at Andrews' schoolhouse, some three miles from Grant City, and on Saturday evening Masonic Religion was given at the Salman schoolhouse. On Sabbath, at 11 o'clock, I heard Rev. E. G. Cooper preach an excellent sermon at the Free Methodist church in Grant City. It was quarterly meeting, and here were such anti-secretists as J. W. Wines, Ed. Turner, Rev. Mr. Cox and others. In the afternoon I wended my way to see Rev. Mr. Hall, at Prairie Chapel, striking an adjourned temperance meeting at Maple Grove, and distributing literature. On Monday night a Bible reading was given at Prairie Chapel, making seven meetings in Worth county. Thousands of pages of literature were placed in rural homes.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Leaving the inspiring meeting of the students at the Sherman House, I hastened, on Saturday, the 3d inst., to take train for Streator, where two appointments to speak for the N. C. A. and its great cause were filled the next day. The forenoon service was in the Swedish-Lutheran church. The membership is not large, and they have at present no pastor; yet they seemed a warm-hearted and faithful people, who listened intently, and kindly gave a collection for the work.

The Free Methodist church was well filled in the evening, as I spoke on a similar theme—The Effect and Danger of Lodge Worship. Pastor Rakabach and his people hang their banner on the outer wall, and are not ashamed of the Gospel or its cross. May God bless their work, and give them many proofs of their faith. The influence of these meetings will not soon, I trust, be lost upon the people. There are about a dozen evangelical Protestant churches in the city, and one-half of these are committed by resolution to oppose secretism in God's name. Financial weakness is the only excuse for the dread some of the brethren manifest toward a discussion of the lodge, and a vindication of the stand they have taken for Christ against this subtle enemy. Doubtless we are all tempted when the purse is light; but we should rather make such emergencies the time for faith to triumph and God to glorify his Son, and bless his people with salvation.

Brief addresses at a Gospel temperance meeting, conducted by Miss Buckley, in the west part of the city, and in the Y. M. C. A. meeting, filled up the afternoon. Bro. J. T. Buckley was again my kind entertainer.

On the stormy evening of Wednesday, the 7th, I accepted again an invitation from Pastor Brohaugh, of the Norwegian-Lutheran church, corner of Indiana and Peoria streets, Chicago, and spoke for the second time to his people, on this occasion taking up the lodge oaths, comparing them with the standard given us in the Word, and noting their effects. The attendance was good, considering the storm and mud, and nothing more could be asked by way of attention and interest in the theme.

Pastor Brohaugh is vice-president of the Hauge Synod, Norwegian-Lutheran church. I have before spoken of the devotional spirit of this people. They are, moreover, somewhat Congregational in government. Each congregation decides for itself about excluding the lodge. I understand that all do so, as a rule; but some desire to make the regulation rather firmer by resolving in the Synod to receive no church to the fellowship of that body which does not keep its membership pure from paganizing worships.

To promote this end the lodge system is being discussed in the church papers, and an honest effort made to know the truth, that the churches may take their stand upon that impregnable rock.

A number of visitations have been made, preparatory to presenting our cause before the January meeting of the Chicago Presbytery. Thus far there is only encouragement for us.

THE HOME.

EMPTY NESTS.

The wind blows south and moans thro' all the trees;
Hushed the familiar hum of honey bees;
The leaves fall off; the maples stand out bare,
Amid the changing scenes, with here and there
An empty nest of the house-haunting dove,
Where all summer long they told their love.
The pines and larches drop their shapely cones,
And the wind blows south and moans and moans!

The orchard shows no living thing of green,
The shapeliest shrub and tree look poor and mean;
And where the blackbirds built their nests and swung
Upon the topmost twigs; and robin sung
His saucy songs in the sweet days of spring,
I see an empty nest—a lonely, loveless thing.
The brown thrush built in yonder hedging row,
But all are empty now, or high or low!

But they will come, 'tis said, and build again
Their summer homes, amid the haunts of men;
For birds are kindred in their loves to us;
They build and brood, and we are building thus;
And there are empty nests to-day, I know,
In many a household; change on all below
Is busy with our best loved and familiar things—
We reach not heaven save with empty nests and broken wings!

O! death has a tender touch, a tearful smile,
A light and lingering footstep, while
The soul is torn and trembling, and then
A silence and a solemn stillness when
We know 'tis ended; but knowing feel
Our utter helplessness; our senses reel;
Amid the strangeness of familiar things,
Death leaves us empty nests and broken wings.

—Charles Blanchard, in the Christian Standard.

FOOTSTEPS.

Do we often consider how strange it is that we can distinguish the footsteps of a person we know and love, even when mixed up with a multitude of others.

A little child once said, "I know the voice of papa's feet." Love quickened his ears, and to him that footstep quivered above all the rest.

There is a great amount of character in footsteps, which is betrayed insensibly as we trip, or jog, or plod along the highway of our daily life.

Here is a quick, nervous step—can anyone doubt the energy and activity of the person to whom it pertains?

A slow, languid glide as surely tells a story of an easy-going and calm personage.

Then, too, how our footsteps tell of the state of our minds and tempers! A hasty, heavy tread of the well-beloved feet, and we say: "What can be the matter now!" A springing, impetuous, rushing, and we cry out: "What joyous thing has come to pass?"

The house-mother lies on her bed of pain. To and fro, to and fro, go the quiet footsteps of her girls, who have taken up the burdens laid down with sorrow and repining; and as she hears these whispering footfalls, somehow she is soothed and lulled into a quiet which, more than doctors and their devices, helps to build up the worn-out body.

She "knows the voices" of these feet, and could pick them out were there dozens beside them. She hears the gentle tread of her anxious husband, as he creeps to the closed door to listen a moment, and is comforted by his tender love and care. Then the girls trip softly by, hushing each other, and her "big boy" stops his whistling and moves painfully along, as though he had two very new and very stiff wooden legs, and she laughs a little as he passes the door, stopping one second to listen to his "mamma's" breathing, and says softly, "God bless him!"

Then there sounds a little patter of tiny feet from some baby outside on the street, and instantly come back to her the long-vanished years when such little footsteps followed after hers, and all her brood were babies. Two of them will always be babies; they never grow up where they have gone to live, and the sweetest sound her mother-ears will hear when she wins home at last will be, she thinks, those little, pattering footsteps, never forgotten!

And so these footsteps are so part and parcel of our beloved ones that even in death we know, and love, and cling to them; and sometimes it has happened that the footfall we thought never to hear again on earth comes into our home once more, and who can measure the perfect joy of that hour!

Two who loved each other tenderly parted one bitter night in tears and agony. One was left—the old, old story. To this one, after days and nights of hopeless, silent anguish, there came one midnight a distant sound. Out of the blackness and gloom it rang in her ears, like the sweet piping of birds in the early dawning! 'Twas the footstep of the friend who had gone away, come back to make life beautiful once more for both.

There are footsteps which we will never cease to listen for—and long for till, "far up the everlasting hills," they join with ours once more, and wake the complete harmony broken here on earth.—Maria Kennedy, in the Christian Intelligencer.

THE STORY OF GRISEL HUME.

We love to tell the story of the sweet girl and noble woman, Grisel Hume, who with her father had many narrow escapes, yet "nobody was killed." The part that she played during the last decade of the long tragedy in the reign of that treacherous coward, Charles II., surrounds her with a romantic as well as a historic interest. We need not go back to the old stories of mythical tradition for examples of filial devotion while that of Grisel Hume shines out on the page of modern history.

She was born in Berwickshire, Scotland, in 1665, when the whole system of persecution was so completely matured that her people suffered the most oppressive cruelty. Her father, Sir Patrick Hume, was greatly distinguished for his patriotism as well as for his statemanship. At an early age Grisel began her labors of love for any of the persecuted whom she could assist.

Robert Baillie, her father's most intimate friend, was confined in the Tolbooth. Sir Patrick was very anxious to communicate with him. The question was, how it could be done. After much planning, Grisel said to her father, "I will take the message." He finally consented and she made the journey to Edinburgh, alone, a distance of more than fifty miles, gained access to the prison, delivered her message, and carried back to her father the prisoner's reply. Her great success at this time as a child letter-carrier caused her to be employed on many subsequent and similar occasions. When she was about thirteen years of age her father was imprisoned for a time first in the Tolbooth and then in Dumbarton Castle. Many a journey did she make between her home and the prisons to take both comfort and information to her persecuted father. Soon, however, Sir Patrick was again liberated.

In 1684 he was suspected of being engaged in a plot to keep a Catholic king from the Scottish throne, and a troop of horse made an ineffectual attempt to secure him as their prey. He now saw that it was necessary to find a safe hiding-place until he could escape to the continent. Such a place must be most secluded, and the family burying-place, an underground vault in a churchyard about a mile from the house, was selected as the safest habitation for the grand old Christian patriot. Only three persons, Grisel, her mother and a carpenter in the employ of the family, knew of this strange city of refuge. During the night a bed and bedding were conveyed to this home of the living among the dead. Here Sir Patrick remained about a month.

For ten years Grisel's mission among the persecuted had been fraught with many a thrilling incident. "New occasions bring new duties," and she now undertook to provide and carry food to her entombed but living father. This must be done so clandestinely that neither child nor servant should know that anything was taken from the home, and it must be conveyed to the hiding-place at the dead of night when all others slept. All such food was cooked and placed on or near Grisel's plate at the table, and she managed to remove it from time to time so as not to be suspected.

Some amusing incidents are told concerning the odd ways by which Grisel provided food for her father while in this hiding-place. One of Sir Patrick's favorite dishes was a sheep's head. One was procured and cooked in the true Scottish style, after which it was placed upon Grisel's plate. Her two young brothers had hoped for shares in the savory dish. While the boys were chatting over their porridge, the sheep's head was stealthily slipped into a receptacle under the table.

Soon they were ready for their portion of the coveted dish, and looking up nothing could be seen of it. One of the boys called out, "Mother, while we have been eating our porridge, Grisel has been eating a whole sheep's head." That night Grisel told her father the story of the boys' disappointment, and for once there was a hearty laugh in this home of the dead.

Sir Patrick's recreation while in this city of refuge was in repeating a Latin version of the Psalms and large portions of the Bible which he had committed to memory years before.

Finally, in a disguise prepared by Grisel, he made his escape to Holland, where he was soon after joined by his family. Here they lived in poverty till the revolution of 1688, when Sir Patrick accompanied the Prince of Orange as he set sail to claim the throne of England. During their years of exile in Holland, Lady Hume's health was so impaired by her many hardships that the burden of family cares fell upon her noble daughter. Here, as before, Grisel's tact and energy made her the guide and support of the family. When news reached Holland that the revolution was a success, Lady Hume and her daughter went across to London in the suite of the Princess of Orange.

Owing to her great beauty and queenly bearing, the Princess desired Grisel as a maid of honor; but this noble girl chose the delight of a Christian home to the splendors and gayeties of court life. The Prince of Orange once established on the throne, Sir Patrick's land was not only restored, but he was made Lord Chancellor of Scotland and Earl of Marchmont. When Grisel took her father's message to Robert Baillie in the Tolbooth, she met there his son George, a lad about her own age. They were afterwards co-refugees in Utrecht, and while there were betrothed, but were not married till after the revolution. He afterward was Sir George Baillie, a man of high honor in the kingdom. Lady Baillie possessed brain as well as heart. She was a poet as well as a patriot; a Christian as well as a scholar. In 1703, when Lady Marchmont lay on her deathbed, she was giving her parting blessing to her children. Not seeing Lady Baillie she called aloud, "Where is Grisel?" The daughter coming nearer to her, she said, "My dear Grisel, blessed be you above the rest, for a helpful child have you ever been to me."

After a long and most useful life this self-sacrificing daughter, poet, patriot and loving Christian went for her crown in the eighty-first year of her age.

Dear young readers of this short sketch of a noble life, try to find out the depth of the meaning of each child's own commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee;" and may it enter into the warp and woof of each of your lives.—Scotia, in Our Banner.

SHIPWRECKED, YET SAVED.

About the year 1731, Susanna Morris, a minister of the Gospel, in the Society of Friends, embarked from Philadelphia for England, on a religious visit. In the same vessel was Joseph Taylor, returning home from a similar visit to Friends in America.

Soon after getting out to sea, Susanna dreamed that the ship would be lost, but she says, in a journal kept by her for her children: "At times I thought it had been as some other dreams, and yet I thought it safe to dwell low and humble before the Lord. I again dreamed the same, and yet was weak as to being fixed in a belief of the truth of it, until the Lord was pleased to favor me with his goodness, and in one of our meetings, held on board the ship, to make it known to me that we should suffer shipwreck. And then for a season I was in trouble; but, oh! blessed forever the name of God! for I had soon a good answer returned in my bosom, that if we would be faithful, we should have 'our lives for a prey.'"

"I hinted something of my mind to the captain, who appeared somewhat startled, and, lest he should be too much discouraged, I had it given to tell him that I should see him safe on shore.

"I hinted a little of what was made known to me to Joseph Taylor, but it seemed like idle talk to him, so I forebore mentioning it further; yet I was preserved so as not to stagger in my mind or disregard the manifestation made known to me by him that is true."

On what is called Christmas eve, the ship struck on the southwest coast of Ireland, about two miles from Dungannon. She was driven on her broadside, yet did not soon break; but the sea, running high, broke over her, and several of the crew were washed overboard and drowned. The captain, Susanna Morris, Joseph Taylor, and perhaps one more, scrambled up to the upper side of the ship, and held fast to the shrouds, the sea frequently breaking over them.

Joseph Taylor, speaking of it afterwards to a friend, said: "Susanna never discovered the least impatience, in word or countenance, all the time." But he confessed that once, in a flutter of impatience, he did say to this effect: "We might as well have gone at first, for we shall be drowned." Susanna looked upon him and said nothing, but he observed her looks were a sufficient rebuke for his impatience and distrust.

After they had been a considerable time by the shrouds, this extraordinary woman had a sense given her that they would not be safe on that side of the vessel much longer; and, although it seemed very hazardous to move and fasten to the lower side of the ship, she urged them all to attempt it, believing it would be the means of their preservation.

She at length prevailed, and they moved in the best manner practicable to the lower side, and soon after fixing themselves there came a great swell of the sea and threw the ship quite flat on the other side; so that if they had not moved they would, most probably, all have been drowned.

A priest, being informed there were some persons alive, and in great distress, came down to the beach and charged his people not to hurt them, but use all means to save their lives; and, through the assistance of a merciful Providence, they brought them safely to land and treated them with great hospitality.

"And now," says Susanna Morris, in concluding her account of this wonderful preservation, "I write not this relation because I would have any to think the better of me. No; that is not what I aim at, but that the poor in spirit or weak in their own eyes, if willing to serve the Lord, may take a little courage to trust in the Lord and be truly willing to serve him in all he may require of them."—Select Miscellany.

GOD'S FOOTPRINTS.

A Frenchman who had won high rank among men of science, yet who denied the God who is the author of all science, was crossing the great Sahara desert in company with an Arab guide. He noticed, with a sneer, that at times his guide, whatever obstacles might arise, put them all aside and, kneeling in the burning sand, called on his God. Day after day passed, and still the Arab never failed in his supplications. At last, one evening as he rose from his knees, the philosopher asked him with a contemptuous smile: "How do you know there is a God?" The guide fixed his beaming eyes upon the scoffer for a moment in wonder, and then said solemnly: "How do I know there is a God? How do I know that a man and not a camel passed my hut last night in the darkness? Was it not by the print of his feet in the sand? Even so"—and he pointed to the sun whose last rays were flashing over the lonely desert—"that footprint is not of a man."—Selected.

"THERE'S THE LORD'S ANSWER."

Many years ago, when in my country charge, I returned one afternoon from a funeral, fatigued with the day's work. After a long ride I had accompanied the mourners to the churchyard. As I neared my stable door I felt a strange prompting to visit a poor widow, who, with her invalid daughter, lived in a lonely cottage in an outlying part of the parish. My natural reluctance to make another visit was overcome by a feeling which I could not resist, and I turned my horse's head toward the cottage. I was thinking only of the poor widow's spiritual needs, but when I reached her little house I was struck with its look of unwonted bareness and poverty. After putting a little money into her hand, I began to inquire into their circumstances, and found that their supplies had been utterly exhausted since the night before. I asked them what they had done. "I just spread it out before the Lord!" "Did you tell your case to any friend?" "Oh, no, sir; naeboddy kens but himsel' and me! I ken he would not forget, but I didna ken hoo he wad help me till I saw you come riding over the brae, and then I said, 'There's the Lord's answer!'" Many a time has the recollection of this incident encouraged me to trust in the loving care of my heavenly Father.—New Testament Anecdotes.

OCCUPY TILL I COME.

Work while it is called to-day,
Watch and pray!
With both thine hands right earnestly,
As in the sight of God most high,
Thy calling ply.

Watch! it is the Master calls thee;
Pray! it is his ear that hears;
Up! shake off thy chilly fears!
Mindful that whate'er befalls thee
Leaves thee farther on thy way;
Watch and pray.

Watch! for demons haunt around thee,
Sin and harm beset thy path;
Yet be sure that nothing hath
Power to hinder or confound thee,
So thou faithfully alway
Watch and pray.

Pray! lest watching make thee weary;
Praying thou shalt never fail;
Though the night be long and dreary,
Though the dawn be faint and pale,
Brightens fast the perfect day;
Watch and pray.

TEMPERANCE.

PROSPERITY UNDER PROHIBITION.

The following statements, relative to the business and financial condition of North Dakota under prohibition, are from a paper read by Rev. J. S. Boyd before the Fargo Presbytery, at Hillsboro, in that State:

"Prohibition has not brought financial ruin. That man in one of our cities who, fearing shrinkage in values should the prohibition law be passed, offered his property for forty cents on the dollar, now sees that same city growing and building up as never before, and, along with it, his own possessions much enhanced in value. Those who, in advance of the law, cried out, 'your stores will be empty, your business injured,' may behold every place where liquor establishments formerly existed now occupied with improved buildings, in which legitimate and helpful business is carried on and attended with evident thrift and prosperity.

"How is it in Fargo, one of our chief cities? A few items may hint.

"There is not a vacant store in the whole place; several new business blocks are in course of construction; houses are at a premium; a few old buildings in the outskirts of the city, that had been rejected as unfit for occupancy, have been moved in, refitted and occupied as dwelling houses; the old brewery is now used as a flouring mill; within the last year three principal Moorehead firms have taken up their abode on the west side of the river, induced by the prosperity prohibition promises and so surely provides.

"And what is true of Fargo is also in a good measure true of our other large towns. One well informed says: 'Grand Forks has never been so prosperous in all her history. Building is going rapidly forward. Several fine business blocks and many beautiful dwelling houses are in the process of erection. Buildings formerly used as saloons are now employed in respectable and legitimate business enterprises. Much money formerly spent in saloons is now turned into life-supporting channels of trade, and all are feeling the great benefit of the change. Yea, even so great is the attraction morally, socially and educationally, that many saloon-keepers in the east-side town provide homes for their families in prohibition Grand Forks!'

"Now, all these things—saloons suppressed, temptation reduced, drunkenness diminished, prohibition fairly or quite well enforced, and business prosperous—most emphatically declare to all people everywhere that those who, several years ago, earnestly advocated the suppression of the liquor traffic, were right when they claimed that, not only from a moral standpoint, but even for business reasons, would Dakota be a better place for good citizens to live in, a safer and happier place in which to rear their families, if prohibition should be adopted."

THE ELECTION AS SEEN BY PROHIBITIONISTS.

AS GENERAL BIDWELL SEES IT.

Politically, to my mind, the shaking up we have had will result beneficially to prohibition. The general outlook is encouraging. Brief eulogies are in order to the People's party. We owe thanks. Their mission is evident; namely, to disintegrate party fossilization. They have made breaches into, and caused great crumbling of, the solid walls of party subserviency. The Republican party have unwittingly done good service. They have challenged admiration by their audacity in claiming our unexampled national growth, wealth, prosperity and almost anything in sight except, perhaps, the discovery of America, as the fruit of their party rule.

With the country groaning under burdens of excessive tariffs, bleeding at every pore by merciless combinations, with wealth passing swiftly into the hands of the few, arrogance could go no farther. Provisionally, instrumentalities chanced to be at hand to call a halt. The Democratic party have done the nation a service by the political upheaval. Bosses may dream, but party elements will assume new, not old, forms. There is but one fold to which the good and patriotic can gravitate, and that is to the only true, and the greatest reform party ever organized in this or any other age or country—the Prohibition party.

JOHN BIDWELL.

AS SEEN BY MR CRANFILL.

The result of the election points with unerring precision to the early disintegration of the Republican party. Beyond a reasonable doubt that party has gained its last national victory. It is utterly routed. The next national contest may witness an attempt to infuse life into its remains, but the attempt will be fruitless. The one issue of all issues that will spring into national prominence is the prohibition issue. That the Prohibition party should even hold itself in the face of such tremendous pressure is phenomenal; that it gained in power is almost a miracle. It has won its right to victory. It may not gain its victory under its present name; but the next party that whips the Democracy will be a party that champions prohibition, opposes monopoly, stands by the public free school, believes in preserving America for American institutions and adheres with relentless grasp to the eternal divorcement of church and state. The hand of God was in the recent election. We are nearer the promised land than many of us dare to hope.

J. B. CRANFILL.

Did you ever hear of a saloon-keeper whom you would take as your bosom companion, as a partner in any other business, or as a member of your own family circle?—Exchange.

We are asked by many readers what we think of an effort to unite the Prohibition party and the People's party. Our opinion on that point is exactly what it has been all along, namely, that the Prohibition party cannot treat with any party that rests upon a license basis; and a party that is silent on the drink question consents by fair implication to the existing order of things. As a national organization, the People's party is a license party. Whatever may be the views of many of its leaders, and probably of a majority of its members, the party, as a political organization, stands on a license basis, just as certainly as the Republicans and Democrats stand there. Until it changes its base, we do not see how the Prohibition party can even treat with it, except as it treats with all other supporters of legalized drunkard-making. What individuals in each party, acting as such, may do in the way of conference is a very different thing.—New York Voice

BIBLE LESSON.

LESSON XIII.—Fourth Quarter, 1892.—December 25.

SUBJECT.—The Birth of Christ.—Luke 2: 8-20.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy.—Luke 2: 10.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

DAILY READINGS.—M.—Luke 2: 8-20. T.—Luke 2: 25-35. W.—Matt. 2: 11-18. T.—Matt. 2: 19-23. F.—John 1: 1-14. S.—1 John 4: 9-14. S.—Isa. 9: 1-7.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The watching shepherds.—vs. 8, 9. The events recorded in this lesson could not have taken place during the chilly nights of December, when in Palestine the flocks are never left out in the open fields, a circumstance which has led our best commentators to put the date of Christ's birth much earlier,—either in spring, or, at latest, early fall. The 25th was chosen because the great heathen festival of Saturnalia fell on that day, but the baptizing of it with the name of Christmas has not taken from it all its pagan characteristics. Probably one reason why we are left in the dark as to the exact date is the danger of making the day a kind of fetich, and regarding it with a merely superstitious reverence; which is, in fact, the case with multitudes who indulge their appetites and run into all kinds of excess on Christmas with as little thought of the real meaning of the festival they celebrate, as if it had never been changed either in name or idea. Without doubt, these shepherds were devout men, and were waiting and hoping for the promised Messiah. There was a general expectation of some great event, even outside of Palestine, but only a few, like Simeon and Anna, and these godly Jewish peasants, were spiritually responsive, and understood to some extent what was to be the character and work of the expected Deliverer. This is only one of many instances showing in what high honor God holds honest labor. Here we see him passing by all the great and learned of Judea, and revealing the birth-place of his Son to the lowly shepherds, who knew as little of the philosophy of the age as they did of kings' courts. That we need not go out of the line of our ordinary, everyday employment in order to hold communion with God is another important suggestion. It is only by the faithful performance of every duty, though it be only to sweep a room, that we show ourselves worthy to be entrusted with the highest spiritual revelations.

2. The angel heralds.—vs. 10-14. How often we are "sore afraid" of what are only angels of blessing in disguise, and though the cloud over our head may be "big with mercy," we "fear" as we "enter into it." "Good tidings of great joy." If we do not preach this, not only by our lips but our lives, if we are not joyful Christians, we do not preach the same Gospel that the angels proclaimed. Neither do we, if we limit by creeds and set lines of our own, preach a salvation "which shall be for all people." And this is the sign: not a monarch seated on a throne, but a helpless babe, whose only cradle is a manger. God is willing to grant signs unasked to simple, childlike souls, but not the kind that human pride naturally seeks. Suddenly the angel was joined by a heavenly host, the echoes of whose song will never die, until a redeemed and purified earth takes up the strain. It consisted of two parts, chanted back and forth, evidently like an antiphone. First, "Glory to God in the highest." This must be an individual, before it becomes a universal song. Our hearts and lives must be attuned to the keynote of praise before the second part can be fulfilled, and we know that peace which he gives (R. V.) to those in whom he is well-pleased.

3. The visit of the shepherds.—vs. 15-20. In our present earthly life, only momentary glimpses of the glory beyond can be vouchsafed to us. The angels must go away into heaven, or we shall stand lost in a selfish rapture, and never bestir ourselves to carry their message to others. "Let us now go," etc. The shepherds did not, like modern rationalistic interpreters of the Scriptures, try to reason away the wonderful sight they had seen. They did not say, "This is only a vision, a mere hallucination of our overwrought senses; and if on the strength of it we get out to go to Bethlehem we shall be laughed at as fools and fanatics." For four hundred years there had been no prophet in Israel, and they might have said, as do many to-day, "The age of miracles is past," and refuse to believe the tidings thus supernaturally conveyed. They not only said, "Let us go now," but "they came with haste." They were eager to see the blessed Child, but it was their faith which lent their feet wings. It is unbelief which makes humanity so slow to find its Christ. They did not keep what they had heard and seen to themselves, but they told it abroad. The religion of Jesus is not a religion of mystery; it has no tyled door, no secret ceremonies. Its very life and essence consists in giving forth the light, as we receive it ourselves, to others. All that heard it wondered; we are not told that they believed. Probably some did, while to others it was merely a strange tale, rousing a temporary feeling of awe and amazement, but nothing more. "Mary . . . pondered them in her heart." Here we have a rare glimpse of the personality of our Lord's mother. Evidently she was a thoughtful, silent woman, who could only unfold her inner experiences where she found full understanding and sympathy, as in the aged Elizabeth. The shepherds returned glorifying and praising God. So when we have once seen the Christ-child, our homes will be the first places to feel the reflected radiance.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—Rev. F. B. Meyer, the popular writer and preacher on spiritual themes, is a Baptist, but has accepted a call to a pedit-Baptist church. His course is not relished by his Baptist brethren.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

—The Twelfth International Christian Endeavor Convention is, next July, to be held in Montreal. For the meetings the use of the National Drill Hall has been secured. This is an immense stone building, absolutely fire-proof, with an assembly-room with an area nearly 40,000 feet. To supplement this, a huge tent, 230 by 130 feet, has been purchased, which will be pitched on the square directly opposite the Drill Hall, and will accommodate a second meeting, if necessary, of 10,000 people. All the preparations are being made on a most extensive scale, and Montreal expects, next July, to welcome an immense gathering. As in Minneapolis, the homes of the city will open their doors to the Endeavor hosts. Accommodation at hotels is necessarily limited.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—Five recent graduates of Andover Seminary have associated themselves for religious work in Franklin county, Maine. Their plan is to work together, in close touch with one another, though each man has his post with one or more preaching stations located naturally at the centers of population where there is already a church; one member of the group has a parish twenty miles long, while another counts over 2,000 parishioners! It is also a part of the plan to hold special evangelistic meetings together at various points as may seem advisable.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The Earl of Rosebery, the British secretary for foreign affairs, informs the Wesleyan Missionary society "that her Majesty's ambassador at Vienna has ascertained unofficially from Baron Gautsch, the Austro-Hungarian minister of public worship, that the statement that the claim for state recognition has been refused to the Wesleyan community is incorrect. The matter is still under the consideration of the Austro-Hungarian government, but Baron Gautsch states that some months must elapse before a decision can be arrived at." Methodism may be tolerated in Vienna after all.

—Rev. Dr. Wm. M. Taylor, who resigned as pastor of Broadway tabernacle, New York City, on account of failing health, has been appointed pastor emeritus, with a salary of $5,000 a year.

—Bishop Thoburn expects to make the trip from New York to Bombay in twenty-five days. At this rate he would travel around the world in much less than eighty days.

—At the Chicago Methodist Preachers' meeting on Monday Rev. J. J. Tobias, pastor of St. Paul's church, read a paper on "The Public Schools and the Roman Catholic Church." Bishop Newman spoke on the same topic.

MISSIONS.

—The year 1792 was the birthdate of modern missions. Then the man who has been called "the greatest gift to the church since Martin Luther" saw his long-cherished desire realized in the beginning of an organized movement for evangelizing the world. "There is nothing," says Fleming Stevenson, "more brilliant or more heroic in our modern church than the passage of her history; and how nobly it rang out the old and rang in the new, as last century was changing into this, the crowded missions of to-day will testify." In the year 1892 what do we see? Instead of one William Carey, more than seven thousand living missionaries, whose hearts and lives are devoted to this divine enterprise. Instead of the £13 2s. 6d. cast into the treasury one hundred years ago, in the house of Widow Wallis, in Kettering, the Protestant churches of Christendom are now contributing more than $11,000,000 annually for giving the Gospel to the heathen. The Baptist Missionary Society, begun October 2, 1792, has been followed by successor after successor, till now there are more than one hundred foreign missionary organizations preaching the Gospel among every nation.—A. J. Gordon in Missionary Review.

—Dr. McAll, by reason of age and failing health, retires from the control of the "McAll Mission" in France. These missions have been the most powerful agency for the teaching of evangelical Christianity in France. Dr. and Mrs. McAll return to their "second home in England," near London. They will, as strength is given them, hold meetings in England in the interest of the mission.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—A circular letter, signed by forty-nine Presbyterian ministers and twenty-two elders, has been addressed "to the ministers and elders in the presbyteries" of the Presbyterian church upon the revision of the confession of faith. The letter raises the question whether any formal statement of the doctrine of preterition—that "the rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice"—need necessarily be included in the confession, in order to preserve "the integrity of the Reformed or Calvinistic system of doctrine." They therefore ask that the recently proposed amendment be rejected, which will leave the matter in the confession as at present, and that instead the general assembly be overtured to transmit to the presbyteries a proposition omitting Section 7 of Chapter III., as given above. Or, if their omission is not enough, then they ask that a new section be added to Chapter III., to read as follows: "God's eternal decree hindereth no one from accepting Christ, as he is freely offered to us in the Gospel; nor ought it to be so construed as to contradict the declarations of the Scripture that Christ is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world, and that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance."

—The Canadian Presbyterian is conducting a vigorous campaign against the dissipation common in that country to Thanksgiving day. "If the day is to be one for sport, military reviews, . . . and the like, the Supreme Court should instruct our ministers and people to stop mocking the Almighty by calling it a day of national thanksgiving."

—The two most influential Presbyterian churches of London are without pastors—Regent Square and Marylebone. The reason is that the people are hard to please in the matter of preaching.

—Miss Kate M. Alling, M. A., of Evanston, Ill., has been elected president of the Presbyterian Female College of Michigan at Kalamazoo, and has entered upon her duties. She graduated at the Northwestern University five years ago, and has since been at the head of the high schools. She took the Greek honors, which had never been given to a lady before. She is the daughter of Rev. J. H. Alling, B. D., pastor of Deering church, Chicago.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL.

—Among the hymns the committee on the hymnal of the Protestant Episcopal church proposed to omit were the old favorites "Watchman! Tell us of the Night;" "Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove;" "By Cool Siloam's Shady Rill;" "How Firm a Foundation;" "From Every Stormy Wind that Blows;" "Am I a Soldier of the Cross?" "Jerusalem, My Happy Home." The convention restored the hymns.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—In the province of Quebec, at a late meeting of the Roman Catholic Board of the Council of Public Instruction, which includes all the bishops and some prominent laymen, the question came up whether teachers who are ecclesiastics should submit to examination, and the bishops all said no, while the laymen, after a short controversy, all said they must. Hon. R. Musson, ex-governor of the province, when the bishops said they alone had jurisdiction, replied, "On the contrary, we are more concerned than you, for we have children and you have not. When we complain of the ridiculous system of education in your classical colleges, you reply that those colleges are founded to train priests and not practical men; and yet, when we withdraw our children, and send them to the Protestant institutions, you threaten us with excommunication. Do not suppose you can much longer brave the Catholic population."

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The religious census of New Zealand, whose population is 626,658, returns English Episcopalians at 253,331, Presbyterians at 141,477, Roman Catholics at 87,478, and Baptists at 14,825.

—Mr. Moody startled a London audience lately by exclaiming: "There are thieves in this congregation. I hope there are many thieves here."

—Miss Jennie Martin has been re-elected State secretary of the Illinois Young Women's Christian Association, and the headquarters of the State organization have been removed to Chicago.

Pittsburg and Homestead, Pa., have been startled by the discovery of an alleged plot to poison the non-union men employed in the Carnegie steel works at the latter place. It is charged that as a result of this conspiracy several persons have already lost their lives and many others are now suffering from the effects of the poison administered. It is also stated that the cook who assisted in the plot has confessed the crime.

In Massachusetts it appears that the Republicans would have elected Haile governor but for the mistake of about 15,000 Republicans who, having marked the Republican candidate for governor, spoiled their vote by marking also the Prohibitionist candidate "Wolcott Hamlin," mistaking the name for "Roger Wolcott," the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor.

HOME AND HEALTH.

WHY THE MOUTH SHOULD BE KEPT CLEAN.

It has long been known that warmth and moisture favor the development and growth of microbes. The mouth furnishes these conditions to a peculiar degree.

All germs that float in the air are liable to find a lodgment in the mouth and nose. Here they may remain, and as most of them are not harmful under any circumstances, they give no indication of their presence, and even when noxious germs are thus lodged in the mouth they may produce no symptoms.

If swallowed into the stomach the juices there contained may cause their destruction and disorganization. If for any reason their vitality is not thus destroyed they may be absorbed in the system. It is possible that even then they may be destroyed or excreted and give rise to no disease. It is after their entrance into the system, however, that their presence is apt to be manifest.

The danger of their entering the system, it should be made clear, is increased when the mucous membrane of the digestive tract is broken at any point. When the skin or mucous membrane of any part of the body is broken one is perhaps considerably more liable to absorb germs of all sorts.—Youth's Companion.

THIRST.

When the mouth and throat are dry, we say we are thirsty, and, if possible, at once drink a quantity of water proportionate to the intensity of the thirst. That there is nothing more than dryness of the mouth is indicated by numerous statements made to the effect, that mere moistening, without swallowing, is quite sufficient—more being quite useless.

Physiologists tell us this is false, and that nature has not forgotten herself when planning that most wonderful mechanism, the human body.

True, when thirsty the mouth is dry, but not always is the contrary true; for example: when nervous influences, as the receipt of a telegram, the report of a severe accident, a ghastly sight, or fright, or fear, check salivary secretion. In these cases mere moistening will give temporary relief, since the normal function of the salivary glands has for a short time been checked, but these are not cases of true thirst.

The saliva is a fluid containing a large amount of water, beside ptaline mucous and salts—elaborated by the cells of the salivary glands from fluids drawn indirectly from the blood. As soon as the quantity of the water in the blood becomes low, it is indicated by a lack of secretion of watery saliva, and a consequent sensation of thirst. Were it not for this sensation in the mouth, by what means would the partial needs of the blood be made known to us?

We unconsciously answer the call of the blood for water, every time we quench thirst.

Thirst is not local, but general. Its sensation is local and specific, just as sleepiness is general to the whole body, but its sensation is located in the eyes.

The mouth is an indicator, a gauge—whereby the fluids of the blood are kept constantly measured.

Thanks to this indicator, we are able often to avert some of the ills of life that would surely appear, were the blood allowed to become thick and stagnant.—Youth's Journal, Pittsburgh.

HOW TO COOK A POTATO.

The prevailing opinion is that every one knows how to cook a potato—doubtful, certainly, after finding a number of people who cannot or do not pare one creditably. Aside from the fact that the greatest amount of 'mealiness' lies nearest the skin, the thrifty soul inspects half-inch parings with disapproval; nor will patches of skin left on here and there atone for the waste. A blunt table-knife is not the proper instrument to use; let it be a small, sharply-pointed knife, to deal with the deep-set eyes, awkward protuberances. New potatoes should be scraped whenever it is possible.

There is an art in boiling potatoes well. To cut them if they are not of uniform size; to have just enough water to cover, pouring off quickly at the right moment before they fall to pieces—these are some of the small things that insure success.

It is claimed that some potatoes—the later-growing varieties—cook better if placed over the fire in cold water. This can be easily tested for one's self. Potatoes touched by the frost are slightly improved by so doing; and whatever their condition, it is a good plan to let them lie in cold water a short time before cooking.—Selected.

Croup is prevented by the timely use of Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup, the mother's friend.

To prevent the hardening of the subcutaneous tissues of the scalp and the obliteration of the hair follicles, which cause baldness, use Hall's Hair Renewer.

Money for Sale.

Congress, at its last session, voted an appropriation to the World's Fair. It directed that the appropriation should be paid in money made especially for this purpose, and should be composed of five millions of silver half dollars, to be coined at the mint, with a special design that should commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus. The World's Fair authorities are now about to receive these coins from the United States mint, which are offered for sale to the people at the advance price of $1 each. The advance demand has been great. Nearly one thousand banks have sent in orders for from fifty to five thousand coins each at $1 a piece.

When this lot of Souvenir coins is issued, there will be no more made, and millions who expect to get them will be disappointed. The World's Fair authorities therefore make public announcement of these facts, and urge the people everywhere to subscribe immediately for these coins. All banks are authorized to receive subscriptions and deposits. Persons who cannot conveniently subscribe in this way may remit direct to the Treasurer of the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, sending $1 for each coin desired, with instructions how they shall be shipped.

FARM NOTES.

BIG POTATOES.

Some wonderful results with regard to potato culture have been obtained by a gentleman farmer in France. This farmer, who is also a distinguished chemist, has been, according to a recent consular report from Nantes, for some time past conducting experiments with potatoes, with the remarkable result that he has succeeded in securing the enormous return of forty-two tons per acre. The plan he adopts is to carefully select the seed and to use only the best and soundest tubers. The ground is dug or plowed to a great depth and is well manured. Before planting the seed potatoes they are soaked for about twenty-four hours in a mixture composed of saltpeter and sulphate of ammonia, six pounds of each salt to twenty-five gallons of water. After this soaking the tubers are allowed to drain, and then they stand for twenty-four hours longer, in order that the germs may have time to swell.—Chambers' Journal.

RUST ON APPLES.

This is a universal complaint the present season and I have my share of it. One thing I have learned is that the fruit on the lower branches which are shaded is the most affected. The open tops have much the cleanest specimens. Low heads are recommended and I always advocated them and still do, but there is a limit. Fruit on limbs near the ground is seldom perfect. At one time early in the summer, my Newtown Pippins threatened to be all rusty. This was after a dry period, but a few good rains checked the disease. While picking these I was again impressed with the importance of thinning out while the fruit is small. I did this on about half of one tree when some other work called me away and it was not finished. The apples on the part I had thinned are worth more than double the remainder. My orchard was too full, and no doubt next season I will have what they call an "off year."—Rural World.

WHAT AILS THE CREAM?

Many a housewife is puzzled over the stubbornness of the cream to relinquish its hold upon the butter granules, or over its quality or tendency to deteriorate from a passable sample at first. The Practical Farmer says in reply to the questions: "What is the matter with the cream? it won't come," or, "it will not do this or that," that not one of the writers tells in regard to the cream or its care, and so this paragraph will be good if it cures, and an accident if it fails. One man reports that the butter turns strong after being made, in three or four days. We suspect that this butter is not washed free of buttermilk with weak cold brine when in the granular stage, and is left exposed to the air at a temperature at least twenty degrees too warm, and the unexpelled buttermilk, which is one-sixth of its weight, goes into the decomposing stage and gets strong in three days. It may be that the cows run in a newly seeded clover lot in which there is a large amount of little, stunted ragweed, and the cows eat about as much of the one as the other. The remedy is to thoroughly aerate the milk as soon as drawn and get it down to sixty-five degrees, then warm it up to ninety-five degrees in a water bath and set, as if warm from the cow; though, if in open pans, it would be best to add a quart of water at 110 degrees, to each four quarts of milk, as fast as set out.

Another man can't make the butter gather. Do not try. When it is in the fine stage of division, neither cream nor butter, add some weak brine, a pailful at fifty-five degrees, and churn slowly for a few moments, and see if the butter does not come. Wash again, and then see if it will not "pack," if the butter is at fifty-eight or sixty degrees. When butter will not gather in the churn, take it for granted that the churn is getting ahead of the owner in trying to make butter by the best known process. The next trouble is that "the cream will not stay in the churn," froths and runs over, and after churning a while it will act like

You can escape just about one half the ills that flesh is heir to, by being ready for them. When you feel dull, languid, "out of sorts" generally—then you may know that some of them are coming. Don't let them get any further. Brace the system up with Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. That prevents as well as cures: It invigorates the liver and kidneys, purifies and enriches the blood, sharpens the appetite, improves digestion, and restores health and vigor.

For all diseases caused by a disordered liver or impure blood—Dyspepsia, Biliousness, the most stubborn Skin, Scalp and Scrofulous affections, the "Discovery" is the only remedy so certain and effective that it can be guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, you have your money back.

It's not only the best, but it's the cheapest blood-purifier sold, no matter how many doses are offered for a dollar. With this, you pay only for the good you get.

soda water. I suppose it does, and for the same reason, the presence of gas, and the more it is churned the greater the generation of the gas. The cream is too sour, and too old, and too cold. Correct the three, and the trouble will disappear. Putting cream of different ages together without proper ripening of them to secure a homogeneous texture, will sometimes result in this trouble. From May to November cream should not be to exceed thirty-six hours old when churned. When cream does not get very sour from hindering causes mix it with four times its bulk of water at eighty-five degrees, and then let it rise the second time; then thin out with water and churn at fifty-eight degrees.—Exchange.

The World's Fair Directors

Have 5,000,000 Souvenir Half Dollar Coins in their treasury, the gift of the American people by Act of Congress. The patriotic and historic features of these Coins and their limited number, compared with the millions who want them—our population is 66,000,000—have combined to create so great a demand for these World's Fair Souvenir Coins that they are already quoted at large premiums. Liberal offers from speculators, who wish to absorb them and reap enormous profits, have been rejected for the reason that

This is the People's Fair==

We Are the People's Servants==

and a divided sense of duty confronts us—

We need $5,000,000 to fully carry out our announced plans, and

We have decided to deal direct with the people--

To whom we are directly responsible---among whom an equitable distribution of these National heirlooms should be made.

The World's Fair Offer to the American People:

That none of our plans for the people's profit be curtailed we must realize from the sale of 5,000,000 Souvenir World's Fair Fifty-cent Silver Coins the sum of $5,000,000. This means $1.00 for each Coin, a much smaller sum than the people would have to pay for them if purchased through an indirect medium. Every patriotic man, woman and child should endeavor to own and cherish one of these Coins, as they will be valuable in future years—a cherished object of family pride.

Remember that only 5,000,000 Coins must be divided among 66,000,000 people. These Coins could be sold at a high premium to Syndicates, but we have enough confidence in the people to keep the price at a Dollar for each Coin, as this will make us realize $5,000,000—the sum needed to open the Fair's gates on the people's broad plan.

A brutal murder at Buffalo, N. Y., on the 15th, developed the presence of the dreaded Italian Mafia in that city. Two men, alleged members of this society, have been arrested on their victim's ante-mortem statement.

In this issue we give a partial report of the proceedings of the New England District Anti-secrecy Convention, as reported in the Boston

Traveller. It is full of interest. The remainder will probably appear in next week's issue of the Cynosure. We also make room on pages 1 and 2 for the address before the convention by Rev. James M. Gray, of the Reformed Episcopal church, on "Moral and Spiritual Counterfeits," which is a sound and timely document.

The war on obscene books in Chicago, and on pictures of undressed actresses on bill boards in Boston, and a timely awakening on the subject in other places, is a movement in the right direction. "The nude in art," when imitated in common life, and promiscuously exhibited about the streets and in front windows, is a crime against good morals for which neither art nor science can find the shadow of a good excuse. It is desirable that the practice should be summarily suppressed.

In electing Rev. J. M. Foster, of the Second Reformed Presbyterian church of Boston, as its president, the New England Association has paid a handsome tribute to one of the strongest reformers and most indefatigable workers in the district, and gained an executive in whose hands the interests of the anti-secrecy reform cannot fail to prosper. We have in hand, for publication, Mr. Foster's exhaustive and able address on taking the chair in the convention, which will soon be given to our readers.

With a strange perversity, that we are sure is not born of ignorance, one of the most vigorous exchange papers on our list editorially appeals to young men in behalf of the great reforms of the day; warns them against the evils that beset us socially, morally and religiously; denounces the saloon, Catholicism, prostitution, gambling, the lottery, Sabbath desecration, etc.; but fails to utter a single word against the wickedness of the secret societies which are sapping the churches, degrading young manhood, and fostering a religion that is not Christianity, but rather paganism. And this paper is edited by men of reputation as Christian reformers! When will mankind begin to understand that Freemasonry promotes assassination, provides freedom for adulterers, and proposes to save men from their sins?

If the object of Pope Leo in sending Mgr. Satolli to the United States as his close assistant was to produce peace and harmony among the prelacy, down Cabenslyism, and fix up Catholic schools on an American basis, he has failed. In a recent address he expressed his views of the school question, which are said to be those of the Pope, but not the views of the American archbishops. It seems now as if the rest of the archbishops had appealed to the people, as they do not want Mgr. Satolli's plan adopted. They say that his opinions are not those of the Pope, even if he says they are. To head off this opposition of the archbishops, it is said Mgr. O'Connell, Mgr. Satolli's secretary, started for Rome last Saturday. The American archbishops say that Mgr. Satolli's plans go even further than Archbishop Ireland toward doing away with parochial schools. It is their opinion that should his ideas be adopted it would lead to the subversion of the whole parochial system.

We have already printed a synopsis of the decision of the Oregon Supreme Court in the case of Philomath College vs. E. C. Wyatt et al. This suit was brought to enjoin the defendants from acting as trustees of the plaintiff or exercising any control over its property or franchises. It grew out of the split in the United Brethren church, which divided it into two parties—Radicals (the original organization, opposed to secret societies), and the Liberals (who affiliate with the lodge system.) The decision establishes the Radicals as the United Brethren church, indeed and in truth, and the Liberals as seceders from the truth and the church. It also endows the Radicals with the property of the original church. In a private note, Bishop Milton Wright, of the Radical branch, says: "A rehearing of the argument (granted, of course) will evidently only delay the decree of the court." Elsewhere we print the declarations of several Radical conferences of this church against secret societies, which are manly and truthful. "The new United Brethren church" (the Liberal), writes the Bishop, "pass no such resolutions."

MORAL AND SPIRITUAL COUNTERFEITS.

AN ADDRESS AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NEW ENGLAND CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION IN BOSTON, DEC. 14, 1892, BY REV. JAMES M. GRAY, RECTOR OF THE FIRST REFORMED EPISCOPAL CHURCH, IN THAT CITY.

I have entitled my theme Moral and Spiritual Counterfeits, and if a passage of Scripture were selected as an introduction, it would be Paul's words to the Galatians, "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."

Satan is a great counterfeit and the prince among them. His business is not so much to deny God, as to substitute another god in the place of the true one. We are impressed with this from the very beginning. There was no atheism in the Garden of Eden. God was acknowledged there, only some improvements were suggested as to his methods of dealing with the works of his own hands. And so it has been ever since. The whole system of paganism was and is a vast counterfeit. So near alike is it in certain particulars to the religion of the Bible, that to this day there are those who profess to be in doubt as to whether it does not owe all the good it has to that source, or as to whether the latter indeed is not merely a sort of evolution from the former. We know better than this. We know that paganism and the worship of the true God are essentially distinct in their origin, their nature, their purposes and their effects. But it is no insignificant tribute to the wondrous power of the prince of darkness that he should have initiated and perpetuated a system which has deceived nearly the whole world, and practically dethroned its rightful Sovereign for a period of 6,000 years.

It is startling beyond anything to observe the trail of the serpent in this particular throughout the windings of sacred history. Now it is Egyptian sorcerers doing as marvelous things as Moses. Now it is a king of Israel leading the whole nation in the worship of golden calves. Now it is a Levitical priesthood substituting ceremonies for obedience, and a fossilized religiousness tithing the mint and cummin and forsaking the weightier matters of the law. In every instance it is not the denial of God that is proposed, but the worship of a false god under a pretended representation of the true.

The history of the establishment of Christianity affords an impressive illustration of the same truth. No sooner does the Lord Jesus Christ begin his active ministry among men than Satan is at his right hand to resist him—not so much to resist as to counterfeit him. And so well does he succeed that even they who should have been the judges are unable to discriminate against him, and attribute the power of the Holy Ghost to the worship of Beelzebub. Philip had his Simon Magus, Paul and Barnabas their Elymas, Paul and Silas their Pythonic maid. And when these superhuman works are overborne by divine power, and they are no longer able to deceive, other methods of counterfeiting are employed. The law is sought to be engrafted upon the Gospel, and the grace of God is nullified and perishing souls duped by the specious plea that to be saved it is necessary to be circumcised. The work of the apostles is handicapped all the way through by false teachers who privily bring in damnable heresies, and through covetousness, by feigned words, make merchandise of men. Moreover, the book of Revelation is a signal prophecy that such would continue to be true even to the end of the present age. The harlot of that book, the modern Babylon, the Church of Rome, is Satan's master counterfeit. For more than 1,200 years has he thus had his own church in the earth, which, by her pretentious claims, her splendid wealth, and her world-wide influence, has competed only too successfully, alas! with the poor and humble and persecuted church of the living God.

Modern spiritualism is a further case in point. We are living in the latter times when many have departed from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils. And as in the other instances, they claim to be worshiping and honoring God thereby. To be sure they ignore the teachings of the Bible, but then they have their temples, their oracles and their mighty works. And they name the name of Jesus. And they challenge you to prove that they are frauds. And the greatest scientific men of our generation admit the genuineness of much of what they do, and are struck dumb with amazement at that which all their knowledge and all their ability can not explain.

We are living in a rationalistic age; in a time when human reason is sitting upon the throne of faith, and when the natural powers of man are being endued with the attributes of God. The Word of God is being denied piecemeal to-day. Intellect is being put as a substitute for spirituality. Sworn defenders of the Gospel are among her leading and strongest opponents. All this in the name of religion, in the name of God and in the name of Christianity. What a counterfeit have we here in the so-called "liberal" preaching and teaching of this day!

It was with these thoughts and convictions in mind that my attention was turned to the whole subject of secret societies. I had known something of Jesuitism, of Mormonism, of Clan-na-Gaelism and the like, and abhorred them. But I had known nothing, comparatively speaking, of the lodge system. I had known nothing of the underlying principles which sustained it, nothing of its history, nothing in any large and general sense of its effects. I was prepared to rebuke it for extravagance, for a waste of time, for a corruption of morals in some cases. I was prepared to laugh at it for its puerility, and ready to antagonize it as an increasing enemy to attendance on the house of God. But I did not dream of very much beyond this. The benevolent features of the system seemed commendable. Many friends fellowshipped it. Brethren in the ministry threw the cloak of their approval over it. It occurred to me that the world and the church to-day might be better off without it, but how much better off had never come in my way to particularly inquire. Very recently, however, my eyes have been opened on the subject. No longer do I see men even as trees walking, but believe that I can discern the cloven foot all the way along quite as clearly in this system as in those of other names already referred to.

Very recently an opportunity has been embraced to read a "Philosophical History of Freemasonry and other Secret Societies," by Augustus Arnold—not the highest original authority, I am informed, but one whose statements are sufficiently verified by those who are. And the greatest surprise has been experienced to perceive the striking similarity between certain of the postulates he presents, and those which underlie the other counterfeits to which attention has been called. The author takes pride in pointing to the early heathen source of Masonism for example, and claims that the possession of the same rules, constitutions, symbols and rites as were in vogue in the mysteries of those times would prove this to be true, even if there were no other evidence to the same fact. He does not hesitate to say that secret societies in general worship not the God revealed to us in Scripture, but that "ideal of a society which shall represent more truly the Christian doctrine of fraternity." The love of God with him means simply the love of truth, goodness, and virtue, a rationalistic, or even atheistic, conception of the God-head which one is relieved to say many of his Masonic acquaintances would indignantly reject, but which nevertheless stamps the order which he especially represents as still retaining an essential peculiarity of its birth.

He speaks of these ancient mysteries as being in a certain degree the "ideal of a church;" baptism of candidates is spoken of and their reception of a new name like unto that mentioned of the Christian believer in Revelation, in all of which we again see the marks of the counterfeiter very plainly. And to this day the system counterfeits or usurps the place of the Christian church, if our author's words are to be received in testimony, since he makes it appear "refuge of the oppressed," "the educator of public and private morals," "the need of the world at the present crisis," "and the only green spot in the dreary waste of life."

But if it be a church it is very much like the harlot of the New Testament. What! Any affinity between Freemasonry, for example, and Romanism?—they are antipodes. Not necessarily; it is very striking how many points of resemblance there are between them. And it would not be at all astonishing, nor contrary to precedent, if Satan should use both of them for the execution of his purposes, by setting one over against the other. Observe the following comparisons: If Freemasonry with its sister societies is a church, it is, first, an intensely ritualistic church, for it believes in symbols, ceremonies and images rather than in words; and does not the church of Rome? Secondly, it is a blasphemous and boastful church, for it speaks of "the majestic figure of Christ as irradiating its portals," to the exclusion of the true church which he founded on the day of Pentecost, and purchased with his own blood. "Freemasonry," says our author, "is the truest expression of the mind and thought of Christ which this age is destined to witness." To which he subsequently adds the claim that it has done more for the civilization of the world and the progress of society than all other means combined—utterances which certainly suggest "the mouth that spake very great things," referred to by the prophet Daniel, and commonly understood as applying to the church of Rome. It is, thirdly, a hypocritical or Jesuitical church, for it confesses to a concealment of certain of its degrees for ulterior ends. The nobles of France, we are informed, were induced to take the trowel and gird themselves with the apron, seeing in it all only occasions for diversion and joyous banquets, while all the time they were covering with their name, and serving blindly with their influence, enterprises which contemplated the destruction of that very nobility of which they formed a part. Is there any very clear distinction between this and that fundamental doctrine of the papacy that the end justifies the means? It is, finally, a heretical church, for it seems to believe in purgatory, and in praying to the dead. It does teach, symbolically at least, that the soul passes through various stages of discipline from the receptacles of sorrow to the Elysian beatitudes of purity, and hesitates not to say that in our struggles after wisdom, holiness and peace we are aided by invoking the virtues and perfections of the wise and holy of past time. Is this very different from the worship of Mary and the saints?

Time forbids any fuller comparison between these two systems, which, while claiming to be so much opposed to one another, are yet so very much alike. But I think that if the secret society system be a church, I have made out a case that it is a counterfeit church. It may look like the church of the living God, but it is not. A counterfeit, remember, not in the mind and intent of those who belong to it, for I do not wish to be a slanderer, but in the mind and intent of him who originated it, and who holds men to its adherence by those subtle sophistries which he knows so well how to employ.

In the foregoing I would not be considered personal. I am not attacking men. My father was an Odd-fellow; my eldest brother a Mason. The former died before I ever recognized him, and the latter nobly and self-sacrificingly assumed his place as the protector of and provider for the family. If his lodge made him what he was, I would be loth to speak against it, and yet it would be my duty to do so, nevertheless, as that which was contrary to the Gospel of the Son of God. I have no controversy with any Roman Catholic. As noble a Christian act as was ever done toward me was that of a Roman Catholic relative who claimed to have been converted in that church, and who treated me as he did from the promptings of Christian love. But shall I close my eyes and seal my lips to the false teachings of the papacy on that account? Friends have I among the spiritualists, whose domestic virtues and consistent moral life, so far as known to me, demand my admiration; but shall I say that spiritualism is of the Bible for that reason? It is generally admitted that many of these "New Departure" men, the "Higher Critics" and Neologians of our time are amiable and attractive in their dispositions, desirable to be acquainted with because of their intellectual acumen, their social qualities, and all that, but is rationalism to be commended therefore, and the point yielded as to the inspiration and authority of the revealed Word?

I do not know that I shall change the mind of any member of a lodge by anything I have now said. But I may hope to be instrumental in saving some young man from being entangled in what I can not but consider a delusion. I would plead with him to beware of that whole system as I would with reference to any other of the moral and spiritual counterfeits herein enumerated, and for practically the same reasons. It is contrary to the Word of God. It is dishonoring to Jesus Christ. It is hurtful to the highest interests of the soul. It has the stamp of the Dragon upon it. "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." 2 Cor. 6: 17. "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Isa. 8: 20. "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Gal. 1: 8.

MOHAMMEDANISM IN AMERICA.

BY H. W. JOHNSTON.

The August Cynosures containing the exposition of the "Mystic Shrine" have been received. It is astounding that such a system could flourish in an enlightened land. While, doubtless, it is true that to the average "Shriner" it is only mockery, and they handle the Koran and swear allegiance to Moslemism merely for play, yet is it not serious business, after all, for thousands of men in Christian America to be swearing themselves into a dark system, with the Koran for a guide, and Mohammed for a prophet? It would seem that nothing in the religions of the world is too false, nor yet too sacred, for the use of the secret lodges in making up their conglomerate rituals. So, on one hand, we find the base errors of the "ancient mysteries," of "sun-worship" and of Mohammed exalted to place in institutions claiming the respect of civilized lands; while, on the other hand, the sacred names and the more dramatic events of Bible history are debased by being associated with such un-Christian institutions.

During the last year the statement emanated from several sources that Mohammedanism had undertaken to subvert England to the "faith," and that all over Mohammedan lands the "faithful" were being taught to pray for the "conversion" of England. To one acquainted with the real character of the Moslem religion, such a statement, at first, was calculated to cause a smile—a smile that such a bundle of ignorance, superstition and and base conceptions of spiritual things could hope to stand before enlightened England. But in view of the exposition of the numbers and wealth already acquired by the "Mystic Shrine," which swears its candidates on the Koran in the name of "Allah, the god of Arab, Moslem and Mohammedan, the god of our fathers," either to actively espouse the need and purposes of an order that glories in Mohammed as he who mingled his religion with his houris and said "are not these the true sources of happiness?"—or, if not actively enrolling as a promoter of the tenets of the "Mystic Shrine," swearing to "be silent even if neutral, and not oppose the purposes of the order," there is room for serious thought.

Let it be granted that the average candidate takes the oath of this Mohammedan order in a trifling spirit, and does not really purpose in his heart to faithfully hold the "Obligation of the Nobility of the Mystic Shrine, as did the elect of the Temple of Mecca, the Moslem and the Mohammedan;" yet will it not follow that such playing at the religion of the false prophet will in course of time lead to the imbibing of the cardinal tenets of that religion—namely, deism, meritorious works, permission of carnal gratification in life, and expectation of sensual joys in the life to come. After all, there is a natural affinity between Masonry and Mohammedanism. The theology of the two systems is closely similar; and since Masonry requires a "sacred book," not for doctrine, but as an article of lodge furniture, it seems to the writer a wise stroke on their part to substitute the Koran for the Bible, since the first inculcates Masonic theology, while the latter condemns it.

The strength of Mohammedanism is in its blending of sublime truth about God with the gratification of every inclination of the carnal heart. The conception of God found in this system, and its forms of worship as well, lift it high above the idolatrous systems of heathen lands, and thereby satisfies, in a measure, the mind of man, while at the same time the latitude of its moral tenets gives no offense to the carnal heart. No carnal propensity of man is sufficiently abridged by the Moslem faith to make the yoke irksome to the unregenerated. Lust is sheltered under polygamy; a whole brood of sin under slavery; though denied rum, they indulge in tobacco; though taught to forsake all idols and fetiches, they wear charms and amulets and ascribe to them every power claimed by the heathen for their fetiches; and, lastly, the merit ascribed to works gratifies the self-righteousness of man; and as there is no repentance, no change of heart, no holiness in their creed, there is naught to grieve carnal pride. As I have studied the tenets of this creed, and observed the daily practice of its followers, I have been led to say that of all the false religions ever invented by the devil, he made his shrewdest stroke when he concocted Mohammedanism.

Not all men that kneel about Masonic altars accept Masonic theology outright; but in course of time the Masonic teachings become unconsciously sifted into their Christian belief until the theology of the majority of church members who belong to the lodge becomes more Masonic than Christian. Recently an evangelist of careful speech said in a public address that in his city, "there is more Masonry in the churches than Christianity." We do not question the truth of his statement; and with this fact before us would ask, are we to have a similar adulteration of Mohammedanism filtered in through this cap-stone of Masonry? Already several New York pastors are known to have taken the oath of the Mystic Shrine, and have sworn, in the name of Allah, the God of Mohammed, either to espouse the objects of the order or remain silent concerning it. What will be the end of this spiritual adultery?

THE LESSON OF STRIKES.

The great strike at Homestead is at an end. It cost thirty-five lives, more than $1,500,000 in wages, and fully as much more to the Carnegie company. Was it worth the price? Has it made living easier, homes brighter, or the cause of organized labor stronger? If not—somebody has blundered.—New York Press.

Let's see! Was there not a strike at Homestead? Who made any money by it? That is, who will give thanks because of that strike? The workers? The Pinkertons? The national guard? Iams? The Keystone State? Carnegie? President Harrison? Who did you say? Louder, if you please.—Cincinnati Post.

It would be a grateful outcome of the whole affair if, the episode having passed into history, lessons in mutual forbearance and consideration could be read from it, by both capital and labor.—New York World.

It will be a great era in our national history when we attain the lofty ground of settlement of disputes—especially labor disputes—upon the broad ground of fairness to both sides, and by appeals to intelligence, justice and reason. To accomplish this it may be necessary for both to concede something; but surely concessions, even when involving financial loss and the sacrifice of some desirable considerations, could never approximate the ruin, the loss to all the parties engaged, and the embittered feeling which the Homestead affair produced; and the end is not yet.—Deseret (Utah) News.

THE RECENT INDIAN CONFERENCE.

Joseph Cook attended the Lake Mohonk Indian Conference, and gives the following summary of the results of the discussion:

Protestant missions among the Indians ought to give up all financial aid from the government. If Protestant missions give up such aid, the Catholic missions will probably not do so.

If Catholics divide the national school fund, they will certainly endeavor to divide the school fund in the States also.

Protestants ought not to give up all financial aid from the national and State governments without first securing guarantees that Catholics will also do so.

Political appointments are more mischievous in the Indian service than in the general field of State and national civil service reform, because the Indians are less able to protect themselves against bad officials than white men usually are.

Education on Indian reservations ought to be compulsory, whenever necessary.

The Indians are nearly stationary in numbers.

The condition of the Indians in the old Eastern reservations is not wholly satisfactory as to educational progress.

The plan of an Indian State is not practical.

The native ability of the Indian, as compared with that of the white, is next to that of the white, and superior to that of the Afro-American.

The whole Indian reservation system should be gradually abolished, yet as promptly as possible.

Instead of special legislation for the Indians, only an extension of the laws now on the statute book applying to white men is necessary.

Funds and lands belonging to the Indians can be kept from thieves on the frontier, or in Washington, only by ceaseless vigilance on the part of friends of the Indians at the national capital and on the frontier.

The experience of returned students among the Indian tribes is varied, but on the whole encouraging. They are slowly leavening the tribes to which they return.

Gainful occupations, such as agriculture, fishing, lace-making and carpentry have been made a success by Indian men and women.

Native Christian preachers and teachers are specially successful among their own tribes; but many Indians prefer white preachers.

The Indian will work for a living.

Canada has succeeded better than the United States in managing Indian tribes, because she has had a less extensive frontier, and, in some respects, her system is wiser than ours.

The chief causes of Indian wars are the ignorance of the Indians and the injustice of the whites.

The Indian policy of Commissioner Morgan and of Senator Dawes is the best.

The platform of the conference for 1892 was presented by the distinguished publisher, Hon. H. O. Houghton, of Boston, and was unanimously adopted as follows:

1. The allotment of lands should be persistently and judiciously continued until there shall be no further need of Indian agents or reservation agencies.

2. The national government should assume the common school education of Indian children, making it compulsory where necessary.

3. It is the duty of the general government to enact and enforce such laws as will fully protect the Indian in his relations to other Indians, as well as in his relation to all other persons, so that as soon as possible he may become self-respecting and self-supporting, and so that until he becomes so he may be protected from robbery through deceit or extortion by unscrupulous lawyers or greedy land claimants.

4. Not only the principles of the civil service law should be applied as far as practicable to Indian service, but the appointment of Indian agents, inspectors and allotting agents should be on account of fitness only, and those holding these offices should continue to hold them during good behaviour. We emphatically condemn the appointment or removal of these officers for partisan reasons.

5. We earnestly appeal to all Christian people everywhere to relax no effort to bring the benign influence of Christian truth to bear upon these people.

A NEW SECRET SOCIETY.

A special correspondent of the New York Voice, writing from Memphis, Tenn., November 25, says:

"One of the results of the convention of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, held here last week, was the formation of 'The Industrial Legion of the United States,' the object of which is to carry out the measures embodied in the People's party national platform, together with 'free speech, a free ballot and a fair count.'

"The Legion is composed of three classes, the first to consist of male members over 21 years of age, voters to be known as the senior class; the second will be the junior class, which will consist of male members under 21 and over 14 years of age, who shall be educated and trained to become members of the People's party; and the third class shall be known as the Woman's Aid Corps, which is intended as an auxiliary to the senior class. The Legion is modeled much after the Grand Army, and partakes of a secret organization character, while the meetings may be secret or open, at the option of the members.

"Officers of the Legion are quoted as saying that it will have a membership of 1,500,000 within a year."

"THE BOYS IN BLUE OF AMERICA."

it is reported from Kansas, is a new secret order recently established as a rival to the "Grand Army of the Republic," by ex-Union soldiers belonging to the Populists (People's party). The order, it is alleged, is to extend its organization into all the States, with a "camp" ritual similar to that of the "Grand Army" posts. We are not surprised to learn that the adherents of the new society claim that the G. A. R. is simply a "Republican machine," and that old soldiers within its membership, whose political opinions are not in harmony with those of the Republican party, are "treated as black sheep in the fold." "The Boys in Blue" claim that it is a non-partisan society, but we fail to see the validity of the claim, since all its organizers are "Populists." It probably ranks with the secret Farmers' Alliance, the secret Industrial Union, and any other secret iniquity growing out of the partisan spirit of the People's party.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 14, 1892.

Congress gives no evidence of being in a hurry to legislate upon the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding the plain language of President Harrison's message, and of the knowledge that every bar-room in the District has been, since the last day of October, doing business without a license—this knowledge I presume every member of Congress has. There has been a little desultory talk about the necessity of this legislation in the District committees of both the House and Senate, and one brand-new liquor license bill has been introduced. When the sickness of a Treasury Department official made it necessary that some one else should be authorized to sign the official papers passing through that official's office, a joint resolution was passed by the House and Senate and signed by the President within less than one day. Why, then, is the good name of the citizens of the national capital left at the mercy of an unlicensed, and practically uncontrolled, liquor traffic? Some twenty-four-hour legislation on the liquor traffic would be very acceptable; but, alas! there are no signs of our getting it.

"Charity covereth a multitude of sins" committed by Washington society, collectively and individually; for it cannot be denied that society is charitable, nor that it has a multitude of sins to be covered. The society people maintain a number of our most deserving charities, by individual donations and by means of money raised by public entertainments. Monday afternoon a "tea" and "bazaar" was given under the auspices of some of the leading society ladies, and attended by society at large, for the benefit of the Home for Incurables, an institution which furnishes pleasant surroundings for many invalids who would otherwise be compelled to occupy the public almshouse. The amount realized was quite large.

The measure generally known as the anti-option bill, which was passed by the House at the last session of Congress, is now the "unfinished business" of the Senate. It provides for a tax upon the business of speculating in future delivery of grain, cotton, etc., so large that it is prohibitory, and for that reason it is bitterly opposed by the members of the grain and cotton exchanges throughout the country. Its friends claim that if enacted into a law the bill will not interfere with legitimate sales, but will only put a stop to the gambling in future prices which is now such a prominent feature of all of our great commercial centers.

Much interest is taken by our church people in the work of Miss Edith Marshall, of England, who is an Ensign in the Salvation Army, and who has come here for the purpose of enlisting sympathy for and to increase the membership of the Auxiliary League of the Salvation Army. Miss Marshall is a guest of one of Washington's leading lawyers, who has joined the league, and already she has spoken at large meetings in two of our churches, one Methodist and the other Presbyterian, and it is probable that others will be opened to her. It is not necessary in order to join the league that one should endorse or approve of every single method used by the Salvation Army. All that is required is that they shall be sufficiently in sympathy with its work of reclaiming drunkards, rescuing the fallen—in a word, saving the lost—as to give it their prayers, influence and money—not less than $5 year. This is the first attempt that has been made in Washington to gain members for the league and very little was known of it here before Miss Marshall came; but she brings strong endorsements, both for herself and for the work of the league, from English churches of various denominations. She is a pleasing speaker and has made a good impression upon those who have heard her explain the workings of the league.

Cardinal Gibbons was in Washington this week, and while here he paid a visit to ex-Secretary Blaine, with whom he has been on friendly terms for many years, and his visit was made the basis for a silly rumor that Mr. Blaine had become a Catholic. Mr. Blaine's mother was a Catholic, but he was raised a Presbyterian, and is now a communicant of that church.

The joint resolution introduced by Senator Vest, last week, providing for the appointment of a commission to make an agreement with the five civilized tribes of Indians for taking lands in severalty, was discussed in the Senate yesterday, but was not disposed of.

The health of Justice Lamar of the Supreme Court is in such a precarious condition that it is not likely he will be able to resume his duties this winter. He will probably go South, if able to travel, in a few days, to remain until he gets better.

REFORM NEWS.

THE NEW ENGLAND DISTRICT ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

A SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS ON WEDNESDAY EVENING AND THURSDAY FORENOON, DEC. 14 AND 15, 1892.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 16, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I have only time to say that the New England Convention, just closed, has been a decided advance on any previous gathering of the kind in this district. The program was carried out, and all the speeches and extempore discussions have been preserved, and if desired, will be furnished for publication in the Cynosure. A revival spirit pervaded the meeting from the first to the last session; and most of the speakers were free in the Lord and uttered the truth regardless of reputation, or intimidation, or former condition of bondage in the lodge, or the ban of popular sentiment, or carping criticism. We bless the Lord for victory, and take hold upon the Almighty for strength in present and future conflict.

J. P. STODDARD.

WEDNESDAY EVENING'S SESSION.

The New England Christian Association opened its annual convention at the Bromfield-street M. E. church Wednesday evening, the session being devoted to the discussion of secret societies. The opening paper was by Prof. L. T. Townsend, of Boston University, on "A Practical View of Secret Societies."

Prof. Townsend said in opening:

To what extent can Christian people join with secret societies? I believe in giving the devil his due when he has any. I have joined and belong to nine secret organizations. Perhaps I am not as pronounced in my belief as some. I have forgotten the grips and passwords, and have not entered a meeting for several years.

Prof. Townsend believed that two or more persons could unite for protection or mutual benefit in an organization, chartered or not, for the protection of state, civil or social purposes. He believed that Christ and his disciples had secrets from others.

He was sorry to say that many secret societies take better care of their poor and sick than many of the churches.

When a secret society became dangerous to the individual or the public, Prof. Townsend believed that that society ought to be investigated and dealt with by law.

Such societies, he went on to say, there are, as every one will admit, and among those he mentioned as undermining the interest and welfare of society, were the Clan-na-Gael, the Mafia, certain Nihilists, the Mormon church, and the Jesuits.

"Then again," he continued, "there are the Odd-fellows and Freemasons; are they dangerous to the state? If you can bring these two organizations under the same indictment as the previous ones mentioned, they should undergo the same treatment. Let the state investigate and see what they are doing."

Rev. James M. Gray, of the Reformed Episcopal church, took the spiritual side of the question, having for his subject "Moral and Spiritual Counterfeits." In his reference to the Roman Catholic religion, which posed as an opponent of Freemasonry, he advanced the thought that if one could consider Freemasonry a church, there was great similarity in the two institutions. Both believed in a purgatory and in praying for the dead. Both are Jesuitical in their secrecy and blasphemous in their worship of an ideal. While Dr. Gray admitted that the greatest kindness he had ever received had been through a Catholic relative, he declared himself incapable of closing his eyes to the false teaching of the papacy. He advised young men to steer clear of the whole machinery of Catholicism and Freemasonry, as they were contrary to the teachings of Christ.

The dangers of organization were depicted by Dr. A. J. Gordon, as it oftentimes tended to develop the enormous power of one or a few individuals, resulting finally in the destruction of many. Organizations have been formed with the best of intentions, and yet have in the long run proved most disastrous to society. There is but one head of the organization called church, and that is Jesus Christ. We are all individually responsible to him. We cannot yoke ourselves to another.

The last speaker was Rev. E. S. Wheeler of the Fourth Baptist church, South Boston, whose theme was "A Practical View of Secret Societies." He did not distrust his neighbor so much as to think evil the underlying principle of an organization which kept its business to itself. He was firm in his support of the G. A. R., and regarded its secrecy as mere formality, concerning its own business. Any minister who allows an organization to interfere with his work in the church is dishonoring Christ. He thought if the church would place benevolence by the side of secret societies and expatiate upon the limited generosity of secret societies compared with the benevolence of Christ, that the former would sink into comparative insignificance.

THURSDAY MORNING'S SESSION.

The session opened Thursday morning at 8:30, in the vestry of the church, with a devotional service, led by James P. Stoddard, the agent of the Association. The business session opened with President John A. Conant, of Willimantic, Conn., in the chair.

The reports of officers followed, Mr. Stoddard giving a brief sketch of the work of the year. He stated that during the year the Association was incorporated under its present name. There is now $3,500 in the treasury, with the possibility of obtaining $2,500 more on real estate. The agent, with his wife, is paid $1,000 a year. To be a member of the Association, a man must be a practical Christian and recommended by two members of the Association.

The committee on nomination, through Miss Powers, recommended that the present officers serve for the ensuing year. The officers are: John A. Conant, president; Miss E. E. Flagg, secretary; L. E. Lincoln, treasurer.

President Conant asked to be relieved from the duties of office, which he has fulfilled for six years. A discussion followed, and by a vote of six to four it was voted to excuse Mr. Conant from further service, and Rev. J. M. Foster, Boston, was elected to the office by a unanimous vote.

The committee on enrollment reported progress.

At 10:30 the meeting was adjourned to the main church, where Secretary James P. Stoddard gave a chart talk on "Fifty Degrees in the Masonic System."

Previous to the chart talk, President Foster, stating that it was always in order for a man to state the faith that is in him, read a paper on the evil of secret societies. He said that the history of secretism is the history of Satan. After reviewing the various well-known secret societies in the world, such as the Mafia, Highbinders, Nihilists, etc., Mr. Foster devoted his attention to Jesuitism. He stated that Lincoln was murdered by a Jesuit agent. Masonry, he said, was born of Jesuitism. Morgan felt that it was a duty to expose the iniquities, and he was murdered. Then forty out of every fifty left the order. It was driven to the South, and the Confederacy was born in the lodge-room.

President Foster asserted that the movement against oath-bound orders was surely and steadily growing, and that the time was coming when no member of a Christian church would be allowed to belong to a secret order. Both conditions cannot exist together, and the secret order must fall.

The work of the National Christian Association, formed in opposition to secret orders, was reviewed, and the need of the movement shown. The speaker asserted that Templar Masonry, at present so popular in this country, is a parody on the faith of Christ and a travesty on the Christian religion.

The New England work was started by Mr. J. P. Stoddard, and an association was formed auxiliary to the National Association. Mr. Foster complimented highly the men and women who have been associated with Mr. Stoddard. Mr. Foster said that the anti-secret Christians should refuse to fellowship with a church which will not cast out and declare against the lodge. Men should refuse political union with a government which sustains secret societies.

Mr. Stoddard's chart talk was next in order, and opened with the statement that there are 867 degrees of Freemasonry. By a chart he represented the various degrees in the Egyptian, Scottish and other rites of the order. The foundation of all was stated to be the blue lodge, of which there are three degrees.

Mr. Stoddard illustrated the course of Freemasonry by the story of a man and his wife, both members of the Christian church. The husband joins a lodge, and on the night that he is to be initiated is the usual prayer meeting night. The husband appeases his wife with the statement that he is to learn piety, morality and science.

The wife experiences an evening of exceptional grace, and when she comes home, wishes to know how her husband has prospered at the lodge.

The speaker undertook to show what happened during the initiation. Some time was dwelt in an explanation of the dress which every candidate has to wear. Each man, he said, is clothed in a shirt and pair of loose drawers of peculiar manufacture, and in this condition is required to go through the pagan rites of the lodge.

Mr. Stoddard characterized the obligation as a pagan outrage. After a man takes it, he cannot answer the questions put to him by his wife. He cannot tell her that he has been "stripped, battered and blindfolded." The speaker insisted that the wife has a right to know these things. No man whose manhood has been debased by Freemasonry can be a good husband.

The highest officer is called the Most Puissant Grand Master. The speaker stated that the present incumbent of the office is Albert Pike, who commanded at Pea Ridge, and who ordered the half-breeds to scalp the fallen Union soldiers, as did the Indians on the plains.

He declared that the rites were full of blasphemy, even in the York rite, which is said to be Christian. No Jew takes the York rite, because of the mention of Christ in their work.

A man, who said he had been a Mason for twenty years, arose and asked if the speaker was a Mason. Mr. Stoddard said that he was not. He said he had been mobbed by Masons, and that they had tried to make a Mason of him.

The questioner then asserted that the speaker did not know the first thing about Masonry, and was giving a wrong impression. He said that the Masons took care of their families, widows and children better than others.

Another member of the audience said he wished to know from someone who knew what he was talking about from actual experience, whether he had taken these oaths and felt that he had done wrong.

Secretary Stoddard called upon a Mr. McIntire, who, he said, had taken twenty-one degrees of Masonry, to satisfy the inquiry.

Mr. McIntire came out, and said he had been a gambler and sporting man for fifty years before he was a Christian. He said he was converted outside of the church, and that since then he found no pleasure in the ways of the world. Once, on a trip to Boston, he attended a gathering of Masons, but things did not appear the same. The talk was not the same.

He had been a breeder of trotting horses, but he had to advertise on his circulars that he would give Sunday drives. He went out and gave prayer-meetings instead. Since then he felt no desire to go to the lodge-meetings. Mr. McIntire said he had taken these oaths, and had seen others take them. He felt that he was right in confessing it, as any sin committed.

Mr. McIntire was asked if he could not do missionary work for God and be a Mason. He said he could not.

"Well, I can," insisted the speaker.

Rev. Thomas Alger, of New York, who had taken three degrees, condemned the Masonic lodge as a place of darkness. There is nothing good in Masonry that could not be found in the Christian church.

Rev. A. S. Orne was introduced as a former Odd-fellow, and said he joined the order as a moral young man, but since he received the Holy Ghost he could not associate with the Odd-fellows.

SABBATH AND THE FAIR.

AND MORE ABOUT PASTORS AND STUDENTS.

The meeting of the American Sabbath Union in the First M. E. church of Chicago, Dec. 13 and 14, was a favorable opportunity for making new acquaintances and renewing old ones along the line of our reform. Foremost among the leaders and workers in the Sabbath cause is Dr. H. H. George, the General Field Secretary, who has long been a leader also in the reform we specially urge. He came to Chicago from the South, full of the enthusiasm of success. Several State organizations have been formed and the people seem to be unanimous for the maintenance of the Sabbath. "There is a 'solid South' yet, thank God!" said Dr. George, "solid for God along this line of Sabbath observance." Rev. J. L. McCartney, district agent in some of the central Eastern States, and Rev. J. R. Day, State agent for Indiana, gave very cheering reports; the latter, especially, spoke of the marked interposition of God in the promotion of this reform in answer to prayer and reliance on the Holy Spirit's influence. Brethren McCartney and Day are Covenanters, understand how fatal to Sabbath observance are the operations of the secret lodges, and do not fail to point out this danger.

On Tuesday evening mass meetings were held in four churches in different parts of the city. A stormy evening cut down the attendance to a discouraging point, but able addresses were given and resolutions adopted unanimously at three. At the fourth the Seventh Day Adventists thrust in so large a company that they voted down the resolutions, and again proved that their mistaken methods are helping infidelity, the saloon and the lodge in breaking down religion in our land. I may not now speak at more length of this interesting meeting. It was helpful to our work as well as to the general interests of the kingdom of God.

Monday forenoon I visited the Presbyterian ministers' meeting on a mission of promotion; that is, to set forward in any way the acquaintance of these brethren with our reform, and secure their co-operation. In this I had much encouragement.

Saturday morning a committee of students met to consult about the Bureau of Correspondence. These young men manifest an earnest and Christian zeal in pushing on their investigation of the lodge system, and they have many reasons to expect a generous response from their fellow-students. Their plan of work includes inquiries not alone of the secret orders, but of churches, literary institutions, missionary societies, investigation of libraries, etc. The expense of their work will be for postage mainly and a little printing. Five hundred dollars could not be better invested than in aiding them. Brethren who have the Lord's money by them should remember these students, who are soon to be our preachers, teachers, editors, lawyers and physicians. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." One dollar here and now may go farther than a hundred five years hence. Mr. J. A. Leas, Lake View Theological Seminary, Chicago, is treasurer. The N. C. A. Board has agreed to aid the Bureau, so that funds can also be sent to the N. C. A. treasurer.

The afternoon of the same day was spent in Evanston, the growing educational city on the north border of Chicago. The Scandinavian pastors all favor a union meeting of their churches on a near Sabbath afternoon in Union Hall, and arrangements are nearly completed.

Sabbath morning and evening Rev. A. W. Parry, of the Ridge Ave. Free Methodist church, kindly welcomed me to his pulpit. The audience increased to a fair house full in the evening, in spite of a driving snow storm. A number of students from the university were present and were among the most interested of the attentive audience. The presence of the Spirit was manifest, and a blessing will abide on the truth. Bro. Parry is corresponding secretary of the Illinois Association, and is promoting the cause among the pastors by wide correspondence. He has a broadening field of labor, and by God's grace is speaking boldly for the truth among an interesting people. They respond cordially to his efforts, and kindly aided the N. C. A. movement Sabbath evening. This church is a light-house amid the shoals of abundant wealth, worldliness, intellectual pride and formality, which beset God's people in this notable city. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

THE WORK IN MISSOURI.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am in Harrison county, Missouri, hard at work scattering literature, looking up old and new friends, and systematizing. For years I worked the Masonic degrees publicly in many States, and have assisted Ronayne, Rathbun, Good, Lowe, Starry and other degree-workers. But there has been no degree-work for a long time—six to eight years—and a new generation of young men have come up and there is an increasing demand for expositions. I am taking up that work again, and will be glad to hear from those who want exhibitions in this line. I am bound to give our cause a hearing, and there are places where nothing but degree-work will bring the people out. They have had lectures over and over again, and want a change of program.

On this trip I visited the two new college buildings at Albany, my old headquarters. They are imposing structures, and doubtless strong institutions will be established here. The Christian College is already in operation and occupying their new building. The Methodists South have their building enclosed, and are pushing it to completion. The city has a fine court-house, a splendid public city school-building and seven church houses. Much improvement is contemplated the coming season. The Antimasons of this part of the State are walking up. But more anon. M. N. BUTLER.

REV. M. A. GAULT IN WISCONSIN.

POYNETTE, Wis., Dec. 17, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—During my interesting stay at Evansville, I was at the home of Rev. G. W. Coleman, one of the bishops of the Free Methodist church. He has traveled much in the work of his church, and is a careful observer of the religious and reform trend. He said there was no religion that had in it so much power of endurance, and that would make such sacrifices as the Scotch-Irish Presbyterian type; and its strength was in the fact that it began so near the cradle. Like ancient Israel, its children were early instructed in the Bible and formulas of faith. And what he admired about it was, its conscientious regard for the Sabbath and all moral precepts.

On my way to Caledonia, where I spent the Sabbath, I stopped off at Poynette to look up the interests of our coming Wisconsin State Convention. Bro. Galloway, our State president, resides at Poynette, and is leaving nothing undone to make this the best convention ever held in the State. The town is quite a center of influence, composed largely of Scotch people. Rev. W. L. Green, D. D., is pastor of the large Presbyterian church where the convention will meet. He is also at the head of a flourishing academy here. The church was not only granted, but "gladly tendered for the use of the convention." Bro. Harrison is pastor of the M. E. church, and feels an interest in the meeting. Some excellent local talent will contribute music, songs and recitations, and everything indicates a large local attendance and interest. There are several lodges in town, among which are Masons and Odd-fellows. There has been little or no agita-

CORRESPONDENCE

SQUARE AND COMPASS CLASH.

—, December 12, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—"The land of steady habits" is disturbed, and wooden nutmegs rattle on the pantry shelves. A Master and a Grand Master, heading a lodge and a Grand Lodge, are involved in the dreadful fray. There is a stunning rumpus among the brethren, and a din breaks forth from three sacred temples consecrated to the worship of the sun.

It is all about a case of so-called "charity."

South Norwalk had a pauper, and the pauper was a Mason. That would never do.

So Old Well lodge took him out of the poor-house and put him in a private family. For about a year they paid his expenses to the glory of Masonry. Then he went to a hospital and died.

Old Well lodge thought St. John's lodge ought to repay expenses, and presented a bill. But St. John's lodge hadn't engaged anybody's board.

Old Well reported to the Grand Lodge of Connecticut, and a commission of inquiry decided that St. John's lodge was responsible.

Grand Master Sterling ordered it to pay the bill, but it objected, and its Master, whose name is Mead, appealed to the Grand Lodge for a hearing.

This was refused.

Then St. John's lodge passed resolutions not complimentary to Mr. Sterling.

Thereupon, his high and mightiness gave Mr. Mead to understand, that a Grand Master of a Grand Lodge was not to be resolute at. Besides, his lodge had disobeyed Mr. Sterling, and used its own judgment about paying money.

Mr. Mead was summoned to show cause why the silk hat should not be taken off his recalcitrant head, and why he should not be debarred the privilege of knocking candidates down and again pulling them up off the floor on as many points of fellowship as he had digits on his hand.

Master Mead vowed, by the ghosts of Jubelo and Jubela and Jubelum, that he would have his heart torn out and thrown over his left shoulder to the biggest flock of hens in all Connecticut, sooner than come to this grand Sterling in the Grand Lodge, to be divested of his apron and ribbon.

He'd see if there was any virtue in Connecticut law, he would.

So the case came up in court, one day, when Mr. Mead asked the judge, would he please make Mr. Sterling let him alone and not unseat him from the eastward chair in the most holy little temple.

"His serene and raging highness," the Grand Master of the Grand Lodge, alias Mr. Sterling, entered a demurrer, and pleaded for the Connecticut court that, as no property rights were involved, the case did not come within the stretch of the civil judge's cable-tow.

"Birds in their little nests agree," but brethren of the "mystic tie" in their little lodges do not always do the same.

To a cowan, this squabble might be as suggestive of insurance business as of pure fraternity.

A brother of the craft might be reminded of the proverb "cold as Masonic charity."

CRUCIFER.

THE TRIPLE FOE TO FREEDOM AND RIGHT- EQUOUSNESS.

ALBANY, Mo., Dec. 6, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—We have fought the rum traffic for years, and temperance people are disappointed and baffled at the meagre results. For forty years every saloon-keeper in Albany, except perhaps one, was a lodgeman. The liquor vendors and brewers, as a rule, are Freemasons, and it is a costly experiment to create a sentiment against intemperance through lodge agencies, and a far more difficult matter to enforce wholesome temperance laws and prohibition through lodge officials, when once obtained. Not only are the saloon-keepers and distillers lodgeites, but Roman Catholics as well, and the rum traffic to-day is doubly intrenched in the Masonic lodge and the Romish confessional.

Worth county spent much time and money for the best speakers, to gain only three votes in four years. Sobieski and other strong speakers, at no little cost, were in Gentry county, and the Prohibition vote was less than in '88. Since the publication of the American Freeman ceased, the lodges have been growing. Gentry county at one time gave Nick Ford, a Roman Catholic and wholesale liquor-dealer, a majority for Congress; sent T. H. McKinney to the Legislature; elected Kernan McKinney county judge, and McCarthy, of Stanberry county, prosecuting attorney—all Roman Catholics—and other Romanists here, hand-in-glove with the Masonic politicians, have been placed in office, time and again.

The simple fact is that when lodgery and the papacy gain the ascendancy in any community, all righteous reforms stop still, or begin to retrograde. Thinking men and women hesitate to longer sacrifice time, money and effort in fighting rum alone, but henceforward they purpose to combat the triumvirate of giant evils that are so linked, affiliated and intertwined that the destruction of the one means the death of the other two; and to antagonize one means the combined opposition of the triple alliance, not only in the cities, but in almost every town and county in the nation.

Do your readers fully realize that rum, Romanism and organized lodgery are allied curses, one in spirit and purpose, utterly at war with every good word and work, and a standing menace to human liberty and free government? These resolutions (of the Missouri Anti-secret Convention) are the keynote of this mighty crusade, and a patriotic public will echo back their revivifying sentiment. Thousands of copies of them have already been printed, and they will doubtless have a very wide circulation. Not only that, but I have sent them to many papers for publication and review. As ever, yours for our holy Protestant religion, temperance and fair-dealing,

G. W. NEEDELS, Sr.

THE MINNESOTA CONVENTION—COR- RECTION.

MENOMINEE, Wis., Dec. 11, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The report of the Minnesota Convention gives a very satisfactory general impression of the sessions at New London. I was a little amused, however, to read about the "Seventh-day Adventist Baptists." It is true that the "Seventh-day Adventists" are immersionists; but I did not say, and I do not wish to give the impression, that the denomination, as a whole, by any means favor secret societies; for the opposite is true. The trouble is, that secretism is worming itself in wherever possible, its votaries "privily bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bringing upon themselves swift destruction."

But a very few Seventh-day Adventist ministers are, or ever have been, members of any secret orders. Some who have, at one time or another, been connected with one or another of the lodges, but have ceased co-operation with them, and have no sympathy with them (as is claimed for all who accept the Adventist faith), are afraid of the agitation of the subject, thinking that it would do more harm than good.

I was told by one such man that "the subject should never be mentioned;" and he said that if I should ever become a preacher in that denomination, and should make opposition to secrecy prominent, I would lose my credentials. The Lord helping me, I do not intend to be padlocked. I could not, and be the Lord's free man.

Nothing short of faithful teaching can keep the foxes from "spoiling the vines." This, even, may not wholly obviate it, but some will be benefited, and the watchman deliver his own soul. May the Lord give the wisdom that is "profitable to direct."

(Rev.) W. W. AMES.

LITERATURE.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The December Review of Reviews, while in some respects disappointing, has popular and valuable articles, as usual. The editorial review of the results and lessons of the late election is candid, critical and suggestive. The most striking feature is the group of composite photographs of members of Gladstone's cabinet, with explanations. A valuable paper is a brief but well-digested summary of the most important legislation enacted by American State legislatures in the year 1892. "How to Abolish the Gerry-mander" describes very fully some reforms in Switzerland, which do away with the district system and provide for representation of minorities. A carefully arranged group of articles on the late poet laureate, by Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie, editor of the Christian Union, by Mr. W. T. Stead, and by Archdeacon Farrar, is profusely illustrated with portraits and English scenes, showing the homes and favorite localities of Lord Tennyson. We have also a group of portraits of poets laureate of earlier dates, and seven portraits of distinguished English poets of the present day, whose names have been prominently mentioned as possible successors in the laureateship.

With the December number—Holiday issue—the Arena begins its seventh volume. Portraits of Whittier and Tennyson, and of Rev. A. Nicholson, D.D., comprise the embellishments. The following is the list of contents: Whittier and Tennyson, by Wm. J. Fowler; In the Tribunal of Literary Criticism—Bacon and Shakespeare (continued), by Rev. A. Nicholson; Compulsory Arbitration, by Rev. Lyman Abbott; Occultism in Paris, by Napoleon Ney; Why the World's Fair Should be Opened on Sunday, by Bishop J. L. Spalding; Evictions in New York Tenement Houses, by W. P. McLoughlin; Government Ownership of Railways, by T. V. Powderly; Religious Thought as Mirrored in Poetry and Song of Colonial Days, by B. O. Flower; A Chinese Mystic, by Prof. James T. Bixby, Ph. D.; Are We Socialists? by Thos. B. Preston; A Symposium of Criticism of Mrs. May French-Sheldon's recent book on African Exploration, by David Swing, Sir Edwin Arnold, Thos. W. Knox and Clayton M. McMichael; Christmas Eve at the Corner Grocery—a story, by Will Allen Dromgoole; Religious Persecution in the Republic, by B. O. Flower; Reviews—Books of the Day. Many new features are promised for the coming year. The Arena Publishing Co., Boston, Mass.

The December issue of Dr. M. L. Holbrook's sterling Herald of Health closes the forty-second year of its existence. Emphatically, it is a magazine for the people, discussing hygiene in an intelligent, off-hand style, and valuable as pointing out true methods of obtaining and retaining good health in the individual and the family. The following subjects are sensibly treated in this number: Heating the House in Winter; The Hygienic Treatment of Indigestion; Notes Concerning Health; Keeping the Body Pure—The Temperance Puritan (by Edward E. Hale), which our readers will find copied into the Temperance Department of to-day's Cynosure; Of Interest to Women; Topics of the Month, and Book Notices. Next month the title of this magazine is to be changed to The Journal of Hygiene and Herald of Health, but no change of management and usefulness is announced. Published by M. L. Holbrook, M. D., 46 East 21st street, New York City.

Our Day for December prints the oration of Chauncey Depew at the World's Fair dedication, on the Career of Columbus; Miss Willard ably reviews the Temperance Outlook; Rev. G. F. Pentecost has another paper on Aggressive Christianity in India; Joseph Cook's Boston Monday Lecture, and a review—by him, we believe—of the Prospects and Progress of the Andover Heresy Case. With the exception of these, the magazine is several degrees inferior to its usual high standard as an authority in current reforms. Our Day Publishing Co., 28 Beacon street, Boston. $2.50 per annum.

The Social Economist for December ably discusses the following topics: The Economic Significance of the Election; War and Progress, by Lewis G. Janes; Atkinson vs. Atkinson, by S. N. D. North; The Law(?) of Supply and Demand, by Arthur B. Woodford; Defects in Our Bread, by Lawrence Irwell and Emmet Dinsmore, M. D.; Current Economic Discussion, by C. S. Robinson; Editorials; Book Reviews—"Who Pays Your Taxes?" Published monthly by the College of Social Economics, 34 Union Square, East, New York City. $2.00 a year.

American Young People is a new monthly illustrated magazine, the first number of which will appear in January. It will take up the work of furnishing choice reading along the line of American history and literature, and entertaining matter of all kinds for young people and the household. The subscription price will be $1 a year. The publication office is in the Royal Insurance Building, Chicago.

Vick's Illustrated Monthly Magazine, devoted to choice literature, flower culture and home interests, is replete with numerous and seasonable horticultural information and illustration—a welcome visitor where flowers and their culture are appreciated. 50 cents a year. Published at Rochester, N. Y.

The January St. Nicholas will contain the opening paper in the series that magazine is to print on leading American cities, illustrated. In this article Col. T. W. Higginson describes Boston in a way to interest boys and girls in the literary history of that city.

OBITUARY.

WILLIAM MACHEMER

died at Constantine, Michigan, December 3, 1892, aged 87 years, one of our oldest citizens, and a man always ready to speak and work against the secret orders. For the last few years he has made his home with a married daughter, whose husband (I understand) belongs to some of the secret conclaves. They therefore objected to his handling my Anti-masonic books or papers through the postoffice. He then desired me to furnish him with some copies of the Cynosure, when I could, by leaving them at a business place which he named, if I did not see him. He seemed strong in the belief that these many secret societies are ruining the great republic established by our forefathers. Oh, how many of these veterans in the battle of life are passing away!

My father is nearly of the same age as Mr. Machemer, and seems still to have strength and zeal to work for freedom bestowed upon him; but this place seems almost given over to hardness of heart, and hardly any are willing to subscribe for the Christian Cynosure, or work against the secret lodge system.

LODGE NOTES

THE DRUIDS.

The recent report of the Supreme Grove, by its secretary, in biennial session at Paterson, N. J., contains the following:

I have the unpleasant task to inform you that we have made no increase in our membership during the past two years, but, on the contrary, have made a net loss of eleven members. The unpleasantness is somewhat lessened by the fact that we have increased our membership over last year by 467. During the past year there has been quite an activity shown in some of our jurisdictions, and if the same had taken place the year previous, or if all jurisdictions had worked alike, we would be enabled to show a handsome increase in membership. On May 1, 1890, we had 14 Grand Groves, 283 groves and a membership of 13,821. This year we have 14 Grand Groves, with 275 groves and 13,810 members, a loss of 8 groves and 11 members.

During the past 2 years there have been instituted 25 new groves, 3 were resuscitated, 2 have consolidated, and 37 have forfeited their charter.

The revenue of all the groves for the past 2 years was $459,977.35.

The assets of the groves are $226,755.49.

The total amount of relief paid by groves for the past 2 years was $158,638.90, in addition to which the sum of $154,481.72 was paid by the Widows' and Orphans' Fund of several States. The chapters paid $4,723.70; the circles $4,165.03, making a grand total of $322,010.35.

There has been an increase in the last 2 years over the 2 years previous: In initiation, 685; in admission by card, 28; in reinstatements, 44; in suspensions, 315; in expulsions, 330; in deaths, 55; number of members relieved, 398; in relief paid by the chapters, $1,005.95; in relief paid by Widows' and Orphans' Fund, $31,556.42; in total amount of relief, $7,524.90; in amount of revenue received by groves, $50,953.97; in revenue received by circles, $708.07; in assets of circles, $1,776; in assets of W. and O. Funds, $5,102.74.

There has been a decrease: In withdrawals by card, 292; in rejection, 46; in membership, 11; amount paid for relief by groves, $3,590.90; in relief paid by circles, $77.57; in revenues of chapters, $3,741.68; in assets of groves, $16,387.95; in assets of chapters, $2,011.98.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1892.

Among the various stratagems of Satan in opposition to God and holiness, and for the purpose of destroying the souls of men, the institution of speculative Freemasonry holds a pre-eminent rank.—LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG, Founder of the first temperance society.

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION.

We are in receipt of a bulletin issued by the University of Chicago, respecting the correspondence school in the department of University Extension. This can hardly be termed an experiment, inasmuch as President Harper, while a professor in the Baptist Theological Seminary and subsequently in Yale University, conducted the study of Hebrew in substantially the same manner, and with notable success. Of course, the present plan is much wider than the one upon which he was formerly working, but its essential features are the same. We have no doubt of the usefulness of such a plan, and fully believe that it will be helpful to many who are by their circumstances shut out from resident study in college or university.

That there is an imperative need that the educational resources of the nation be brought into closer contact with the mind of the whole people, no one who has thought at all upon the subject can doubt. Our great libraries are valueless to a large portion of the community in which they are placed, simply from the fact that hundreds of thousands of people have no taste for literature which is healthful and helpful. Text books on science, masterpieces of history and literature are of no more use to a shallow, uneducated, thoughtless people than they would be to a parcel of savages. The reports of all our libraries indicate that fiction is the great thing desired; and, while there are exceptions, the rule is that the mind which chiefly feeds on fiction is essentially weak and uncultured. We have in our days the most splendid group of poets known to history; a group of historians as excellent in style and as honest and thorough in research as the world has ever known. The texts on science, while varying and wavering, are certainly vastly multiplied; yet there are hundreds of thousands of people, as stated above, in our great cities, who cannot understand and who do not care for any of these things.

Any plan which will awaken these minds and put them on the track of better things is to be welcomed by all who care for the interests of society.

DOING EVIL THAT GOOD MAY COME.

We have received the first number of a finely printed and illustrated sixteen-page weekly paper, entitled, "The Boys' Brigade Courier: The Official Organ of the Boys' Brigade in the United States."

We can scarcely think of a more unwise and misdirected effort to do good.

While we cheerfully admit that those who have engaged in this enterprise are actuated by an honest desire to benefit our boys, we cannot but think that their methods are so entirely un-Christian that, sooner or later, it will result in a deplorable lapse in religion and morals among our youth who shall have graduated from this school. Our objections are:

1. That it tends to popularize and promote a war-spirit; to build up the old heathen idea, that "he who is not a citizen of my country is a natural enemy," and that "I may lawfully kill him, even though he has been guilty of no crime, except that he is the victim of the misrule of others."

It cultivates the spirit of Cain, of which we all have too large an inheritance. It is doubtless for this reason that (as we are told) "boys love the military feature of the work." It is the same unholy instinct that led thousands to flock to the brutal combat between Corbett and Sullivan, and makes the nations of Europe, like rival ruffians, ready at any moment to pounce on each other and literally butcher their millions of subjects.

Have the originators and friends of this movement stopped to think what a terrible thing is international war? Do they realize how easy it is to set it at work, and how hard to arrest its progress? Have they thought of the unseemly spectacle of Christian men deliberately shooting each other? Have they ever considered the demoralizing influence of all wars—how they depress all Christian influences, put back the dial of all true reforms, and substitute the rule of hate for the law of love? And what is military drill in which our dear boys are invited to become proficient as a part of their Christian education? It is the art of killing men who may be as well-intentioned as themselves, and doing it scientifically, quickly, and with the least danger to themselves. It is the art of executing vengeance on those rulers whom we are sure not to reach, by slaughtering their unoffending subjects. It is fratricide in gigantic proportions, and which has its impulse in the lusts of the heart. See James 4: 1, 2. And to think of doing this in the name of Him who said, "Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you;" "be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good!"

We confidently appeal to all our fellow-Christians, Is there—can there be—anything more unlike and antagonistic to the Spirit of Christ than the spirit and practice of war?

But it may be said, that to promote the military spirit is not the object of this movement. We hope this is true; but let them reflect that much that we learn comes not from direct teaching, but from suggestion. This is true of all evil influences. What would we think of a society which, as an inducement to Bible study, should give the boys nice meerschaum pipes, or packs of playing-cards, or, worse still, should distribute lewd pictures? The suggestion of evil would not be more certain in the one case than in the others. Parading with guns—the church owns the guns!—swords and bayonets may be less offensive to good taste, but it is not less likely to inspire the love of military achievement, and to teach that they are consistent with Christianity.

2. We object to this whole scheme for one of the reasons that is urged for its adoption, viz., that "it teaches implicit obedience to all orders, without question and without remark." We do not know of a more pernicious doctrine that has ever been taught in the name of Christianity. No intelligent person can possibly owe such obedience except to God, and even he condescends to reason with us. To teach such a doctrine is to teach Jesuitism in its most objectionable form. What our boys specially need is an enlightened conscience—such knowledge of the Word and Spirit of God that they shall decide every question of duty for themselves, and on its merits.

One of the most deleterious things in military rule is, that it takes away this right of private judgment, and compels men to substitute the authority of the officer in place of the law of Christ. So that the soldier who has sworn obedience to his officer may be required to throw shells into a city full of women and children; and he has no rights of conscience in the matter. He must obey, or die.

May God forbid that we should teach our boys such principles as this in the name of our Divine Lord. Surely there is a more excellent way of getting our boys interested in the study of God's Word. What that may be we purpose to indicate in next week's issue.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

Nearly all the annual conferences of the United Brethren (old constitution), at their latest sessions passed strong resolutions against secret societies. We give a few samples of those resolutions.

Rock River Conference said:

WHEREAS, Our church has ever stood in open opposition to every organization that is evil in its nature and tendency, therefore,

Resolved, 1. That we stand upon the constitution of 1841 and confession of faith of 1815, which have, under God, been the means of saving many young men from Baal worship, now carried on by the lodge system.

2. That we as ministers and laymen of Rock River Conference will faithfully maintain the laws of our church relating to secret societies, as well as other immoralities.

3. That we will preach against those evils and instruct the young people in the principles of the church we so dearly love.

North Ohio Conference said: "The current events of the day, such as the assassination of Captain William Morgan and many others by Masons (Morris' Dictionary of Freemasonry; Art. "Anti-masonry"); Chief Policeman David Hennessey by the Mafia; Dr. Cronin by the Clan-na-Gael; Dr. Haddock by the rum power in connection with the Knights of Pythias; the bloody work of the Highbinders; the conspiracy of the White Shielders against the liberty and lives of the colored men of the South; the waste of millions of God's money by the secret orders in vain show and mischief under false pretenses of charity; together with the frequent unrighteous court decisions under the control of the secret empire, amount to an overwhelming demonstration of the correctness and righteousness of our position as a church, that organized secretism is against Christ and his church, and unfit for a place in her communion."

Michigan Conference adopted the following:

WHEREAS, We believe that organized secret societies are evil in their nature; and

WHEREAS, Anti-Christian combinations are rapidly increasing and clearly demonstrating their anti-Christian character, endangering the peace and prosperity of church and state; therefore,

Resolved, 1. That it is the imperative duty of all Christians to refrain from connection with such combinations.

2. That this is no time for us as a church to compromise with worldly secret associations.

IS THIS TRUE?

Chauncey Depew is credited with making this remarkable statement before the Senate Interstate Commerce Commission: The effect of the law, said Dr. Depew, has been to promote trusts beyond anything that has ever been dreamed of. If the law continued in force five years longer, he said, there would not be an independent business man in any of the large cities of the United States. And had he hope then for the survival of commercial independence in the small cities? Nay, for he asserted farther on that if the law continued, all way-stations would cease to exist for commercial purposes. The big cities would absorb the little ones; the trusts would own the big cities. If this is not the prejudiced view of a railroad president, it is a strong indictment against what has hitherto been considered a beneficial law. But he may be right, after all.

LABOR REFORM.

The twelfth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor began in Philadelphia last week. President Gompers' report briefly reviewed the strikes in Tennessee coal mines, at Homestead, at Buffalo, at Coeur d'Alene, etc., with the usual denunciation of the methods employed to subdue the riotous demonstrations of the strikers.

The report of Secretary Evans showed that during the year commenced Nov. 1, 1891, and ended Oct. 31, 1892, 277 charters have been issued, including local unions, central bodies, and State Federations in thirty-two States of the Union. In addition, eight charters have been issued to National Unions, making a total of 285 for the year, the largest number ever issued during one year since the Federation was organized. The receipts for the last year were $25,999, and the expenses $18,324.

A special committee was appointed by the consideration of methods for limiting to their proper functions the military and judicial powers, which it was resolved had been used in contravention of law and government during recent labor encounters.

Another resolution on the same topic was reported favorably, providing that as the strike and boycott had failed as weapons of organized labor, a campaign of education should be inaugurated by the federation, and the power of the ballot should be arrayed in the struggle for union supremacy. For this purpose the executive council was recommended to use such funds of the Federation as should be found necessary. The resolution was referred to the special committee, with several others aimed against the military.

Numerous resolutions were introduced. Among them were the following: Favoring the assistance of labor men in the inspection of certificates of returning Chinese; prohibition of Japanese immigration; for a congressional investigation of the Cœur d'Alene troubles; for establishing friendly relations with the Knights of Labor; favoring the opening of schoolhouses for public meetings; for the removal of federation headquarters west of Cincinnati; for the exposition of the labor problem in public schools.

HIDING BEHIND ITS ABOMINATIONS.

It was the remark of Thaddeus Stevens, after a most searching investigation of Freemasonry, which had been ordered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and in which all-important facts were established by sworn testimony, that "Masonry hides itself behind its own terrible deformities." He held that were the ceremonies of initiation, its oaths and penalties, such that a self-respecting man would have no occasion to be ashamed of them, its power over its members would be greatly lessened, and the impulse of the Mason to conceal and deceive would be greatly diminished. The system, in his estimation, had been most carefully devised, with special reference to the pledge of secrecy and of subordination to the order.

All those who have, for any length of time, been engaged in the anti-secret reform have observed how difficult it is to convince pure-minded Christian men and women that ministers of the Gospel, members of Congress, and governors of States, have been thus nearly stripped, hoodwinked, haltered, led around "like an ox to the slaughter and a fool to the correction of the stocks," and thus made to take an oath which, in the language of President John Quincy Adams, "a common cannibal might be ashamed of." They could possibly believe these things of ruffians and rowdies, but it is hard to think them true of judges and bishops. It is a strange phase of human nature that such things should be possible. We know nothing analogous to it, unless it be the love which men acquire for vile and poisonous tobacco and alcohol so that they become enslaved and led captive by Satan at his will. Haply there is most abundant evidence in exoteric Masonry, which can neither be hidden nor disguised, that the system is of the wicked one, and a terrible snare to men.

MARY ALLEN WEST.

BY THE N. C. A. CORRESPONDING SECRETARY.

The death of this noble woman deserves more than a passing notice. Among the few women of intellectual rank and of wide and well-won influence, she was never ashamed or afraid to avow her convictions respecting the secret orders as both needless and of dangerous tendency. Her brief address at the last conference held by the N. C. A. in 1891 in this city will not soon be forgotten, and during the six or seven years of her labor as editor of the Union Signal, the cause represented by the Cynosure had many a friendly word.

The hand of her old teacher, Jonathan Blanchard, would be the one above all others to write a sketch of her character. The love and reverence with which she always spoke of him was reciprocated by a regard equally warm and sincere.

Miss West was 55 years old at the time of her death. She was born in Illinois and her life work was done in this State. After graduating from Knox College, under the late editor of the Cynosure, she taught for years in the public schools of Galesburg and was for nine years chosen superintendent of schools in Knox county, when it was far more rare than now for women to hold public office. Miss West never needed the endorsement of a party to secure such a position of responsibility and honor. Her integrity, ability and native force of character commanded the respect of all parties. That she was not elected State superintendent of schools when nominated by the Prohibition party was surely no fault of hers. The experience of these years of school teaching and management provided her a theme for a large and valuable volume, "Childhood, its Care and Culture," which she gave to the press about the time she came to Chicago as co-editor of the Signal with Mrs. Mary B. Willard. The removal of the latter to Germany placed the sole editorial responsibility upon Miss West, and until her death her name has been at the head of the editorial columns. During these years of service as editor she has given much time to lecture work and conducting "schools of methods" in all parts of the country to instruct the working women of the temperance cause in the most effective means of promoting the reform.

About January 1st the present year, failing health from overwork constrained her to take a long vacation. She joined the editorial excursion to California, and shared the sumptuous reception tendered at Auburn on the west side of the Sierras, where nature vied with the hospitality of the people in welcoming the travelers after their two thousand miles of cloud and storm.

After a few months in California she began a tour of the world, promoting the cause of the W. C. T. U. In Japan a special and arduous work was before her, introduced by the friendship of natives whom she had met in America. Probably these labors, amid new and interesting scenes and an engaging people, overtaxed her strength and suddenly cut off her useful life. The details of her last illness have not yet been received; only a notice of her death on Dec. 1st, and of a funeral service on the 10th. A memorial service was held in the Temperance Temple in this city at the same time Saturday afternoon.

Few American women are chosen to more useful lives, or pass away more sincerely lamented.

—Father McGlynn, the New York Catholic priest, who adopted Henry George's views of taxation and gave offence to the Vatican by his advocacy of the single tax, it is reported, is to return to the bosom of the church, and will be absolved and reinstated.

—Our readers will miss Miss Flagg's customary New England Letter this week, owing to her attendance upon the New England District Anti-secrecy Convention, of which she is the efficient secretary. But New England, through other sources, is excellently represented in these columns this week, in the reports and addresses of this important gathering.

—We are prepared to send to new subscribers, for $2, in advance, the Cynosure for one year, and a copy of Rev. Dr. Carradine's excellent book—"A Journey to Palestine"—which sells for $1.50, both postage free. This is one of the best offers that we have yet made. The book is one to interest and instruct any household. Send in subscriptions at once.

—In connection with our own anti-secrecy literature, we will send any miscellaneous or gift-book to our readers (the money to be sent with the order) at 20 per cent. (one-fifth) less than the regular prices of such publications. This offer will remain open all this month of December, and will afford an excellent opportunity to obtain holiday books at a very reasonable rate.

—Mr. Shanibarger, of Mansfield, Ohio, writes: "I have been told that Bishop Newman, during his Sabbath sermon at the North Ohio Conference at Elyria, gave certain signs of Masonry in the pulpit, in response to which there was a shameless twitter ran through the audience; whereupon the bishop remarked that he was glad there was not the opposition to Masonry there once was." The shamelessness of this incident (if it occurred as related) indicates the width of the "great gulf" that exists between modern Methodism and primitive Christianity.

—The statement in our issue of December 8 (copied from a Chicago daily paper), that Mrs. Lease "was strong-minded, and an almost fanatical Roman Catholic" when she lived in Texas, leads the Midland, of Omaha, Neb., to "doubt that she is Roman Catholic, and deny that she is a fanatical Roman Catholic." Whatever she was in Texas, the Midland brings the testimony of her little daughter that Mrs. Lease is now a Disciple, or, as she called her, a "Campbellite." Mrs. Lease confirms the evidence by saying that "Louise is right." We cheerfully give place to the correction.

—The Pacific of San Francisco says that Dr. J. E. Roy, of the American Missionary Association's office in this city, has lately closed a five-months' lecturing trip in California. His theme has been the great mission of the A. M. A. among the colored people and mountain whites of the South, the Indians and the Chinese. He has also frequently spoken on temperance. All these lectures have been illustrated with fine lantern views. We welcome Dr. Roy back to Chicago after his long absence. In connection with the World's Fair he has charge of a department for the promotion of information about the "Dark Continent."

—At a meeting of the Ministers' Association, in Milwaukee, Wis., the other day, the question of securing the co-operation of the Lutheran clergymen was discussed. Rev. Henry Noehren read a paper on "The Union in Germany of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches, and the Effect of that Union in America." The object of the proposed local union is to meet the Lutherans on common grounds, and together oppose the public and social evils that abound in the city. Prevailing and flagrant violations of law, with Sunday theaters and open saloons, were denounced. Would it not be well to unite all cities in an aggressive crusade against these evils?

—The American Sabbath Union, at its annual session in Chicago, last week, discussed at length the efforts now being made to open the World's Fair on Sunday, despite the action of Congress and the protests of most Christian denominations. Strong resolutions against this retrograde movement were supported by eloquent speeches and adopted. The following telegram sent to Congressman Dolliver, of Iowa, voices the general sentiment of the Association: "Chicago, Dec. 14. —The National Convention of the American Sabbath Union, meeting in this city, respectfully requests our Congress, and especially the committee on the World's Fair, that no action be taken to repeal the Sunday-closing law. Mass-meetings were held in three different parts of the city last night protesting against this repeal as an act dishonorable to Congress and the nation."

—Prof. Henry P. Smith, of Lane Theological Seminary, who has been on trial for heresy before the Cincinnati Presbytery, has been found guilty upon two charges, and suspended from the active ministry of the Presbyterian church. The second charge was that he taught contrary to the fundamental doctrine of the Word of God and of the confession of faith, that the Holy Spirit did not so control the inspired writers in their composition of the Holy Scriptures as to make them absolutely truthful, i. e., free from error, when interpreted in their natural and intended sense. The third charge accused him of teaching an inspiration of the Scriptures in a sense different from that taught by the Scriptures themselves and by the confession of faith. With these un-Presbyterian views, why did he not voluntarily withdraw from the denomination months ago and start an independent "people's church," like his brother recalcitrants in Chicago?

tion of the question here, and little prejudice or opposition is awakened.

I held three meetings in the Caledonia U. P. church, and received liberal contributions for the cause, and a number of Cynosure subscribers. The people here are of the granite Scotch, psalm-singing type, who have maintained their church and their testimony against secret orders for more than forty years. Bro. H. H. Hinman had lectured here and obtained strong financial aid. It is the amount of contributions given that more than any other test decides the real interest in the cause. Bro. Galloway is pastor here and at Arlington, near Poynette, and in the short time he has been here has done much to strengthen the cause.

I had an appointment to lecture in the Free Methodist church near Caledonia on Tuesday evening, but the storm prevented. The pastor, Rev. C. V. Hughes, at whose home I spent the night, is thoroughly awake on reform issues. Here I met Rev. Robt. Pate, pastor of the Free Methodist church at Baraboo, who is one of the strong men of his denomination. He and Bro. Hughes were both at my meetings at Pardeeville, where I lectured the next two evenings. The pastor, Rev. A. Longfield, with Bro. E. P. Tullis and these two brethren, all took part in these meetings. We had good audiences and deep interest; indeed, I was greatly inspired by our little convention at Pardeeville. These brethren are all afire with zeal for reform, and seemed, with prophetic eye, to see the danger so near at hand. Bro. Hughes has studied the issue with Jesuitry and believes we are near a great conflict on this question.

THE HOME.

A LITTLE WHILE WITH JESUS.

A little while with Jesus, at morning, noon, or night,
Will give you strength in weakness, will make your pathway light;

'Twill calm the fevered pulses and cool the throbbing brow,

To steal away to Jesus, and at his footstool bow.

A little while with Jesus, while he is passing by,
To drink into his spirit, to feel his presence nigh;
To feel his love so precious, to contemplate the grace
That brought me while a sinner into his loved embrace.

A little while with Jesus; to hear his voice within,
Untrammelled by my doubting, heard clear above the din,
Those words so satisfying, that tell of life so blest,
That take the sting from dying, and breathe eternal rest.

A little while with Jesus; he's near me now. I'll go
And seek the needed blessing he waiteth to bestow—
The power I need this moment; the help I need this day,
I now will seek from Jesus; "Lord, teach me how to pray,"

—Rev. Thos. Billings.

THE STORY OF NEW ULM.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Thirty-five or forty years ago, in one of the far Western States, on a plain at the foot of the Rockies, a company of men had located and built themselves homes. They were roughs of the worst class: ranchmen, cowboys, who had served terms in the mines of California—drunken, profane wretches whose only law was the rifle or the rope. The place where they lived had grown to be a good-sized town; and the inhabitants boasted that Satan ruled there. No church or school-house stood within its limits; no preaching or Gospel singing was ever heard there; Sabbath-day was given over to horse-racing, card-playing, the theatre, etc. This spot, where wickedness and infidelity had gone to seed, was called New Ulm.

But God's avenging angels kept watch above that place, and in less than three years from the time when the town was organized, on a sweet Sabbath morning in May, while the people were sleeping, the wild Indians attacked it. Strong men hid themselves in cellars and in caves of the earth; women and children were butchered and scalped on the streets; shrieks and cries resounded upon the still, summer air. Men were dragged from their places of concealment and butchered, or were made prisoners; and then the town was set on fire, and every building was burned to the ground; not a house was left standing to mark the spot where the town had stood. New Ulm was made a desolation.

Let it be remembered that the reign of sin and infidelity, in whatever form it may appear, is always brief. The law of God declares that right shall triumph over wrong. Sin brings its own punishment; for, saith Holy Writ, "Though hand be joined in hand, He will not let the wicked go unpunished."

Steamburgh, N. Y.

THE ADDER'S STING.

I lived once in a town where happened the most thrilling church occurrence of which I ever heard. I write about it, praying that the writing may be blessed by God, even as he blessed the confession of the chief character in the story.

Central church was wealthy; its membership was large, and its pastor one of the purest.

Among the many families of culture and wealth who frequented this church was that of Colonel Fielder. May Fielder, his only child, was a general favorite, and a lovelier girl either in character or personal beauty I have never known. Wealth had not spoiled her disposition. Her eyes and hair were of the softest brown, and her complexion that delicate peach bloom so seldom met with. Some few there were who said it was no wonder that May had a pleasant expression and a charming smile, for in all her seventeen years she had had nothing to trouble her.

But the Friend, who alone can see our hearts, knew that there was no lack of care in the gentle breast of May Fielder. Her's was just the disposition to suffer most keenly where cause for suffering was felt, and May had a secret and deadly trouble. It was all about her father, and she spent many hours on her knees thinking about and praying for him.

Mr. Fielder was a steward in the church, so benevolent, so wise and so respected, that he was looked upon almost with reverence by all classes of people. He was one of those rich men who have pleasant manners. The poor felt as much at ease in his company as did the rich. His good deeds can never be numbered, and the name of his friends was legion.

And yet his daughter sat alone in her bedroom many times thinking of his fast silvering hair, and reading through a mist of tears these words: "The hoary head is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness."

Often at night she fell asleep with tear-wet cheeks because of the words: "No drunkard shall enter the kingdom of heaven." If to get drunk many times was to be a drunkard, her father was surely a drunkard.

But, I hear you say, "this is preposterous."

By no means! Do you never hear of secret sins? Do you never hear of night drinkers?

Mr. Fielder, walking blameless among his fellow-men, and Mr. Fielder alone in the sanctity of home, were two different men.

May's father had always had her tenderest love, and for several years she had lived in daily dread of the words: "Be sure your sin will find you out." Every morning she watched him covertly, but earnestly, the color coming and going on her cheeks, to see if he was in a fit condition to pass unblameable among his fellow-men. Little did she dream that she herself would be the accusing angel who would expose his sin to the world.

One day, when the wind blew with cutting blasts, the news that May Fielder was alarmingly ill, spread through the town. No one heard it who did not feel sorry, for May's bright face had smiled on a great many people as she passed in and out of the beautiful church, or in the homes of acquaintances and friends. Even the forlorn little beggars of the town were sorry that she suffered, for to them, too, she had added blessings. The very servants about her home hushed their joking, and attended to their duties in subdued silence.

A physician from a neighboring city was early summoned to consult with the family physician; but his wisdom could accomplish no new good. May became rapidly worse, and also delirious. In her mental wanderings she thought it was her father who was sick. Finally, she imagined him dying. Then came the time of her supreme agony. Such were the prayers that issued from her lips that both physicians bowed themselves, and wept like heart-broken women, while her mother fled from the room to hide her woe. The father alone stood, seemingly unmoved, watching with fascinated gaze the face of his child as she plead with God to remember her father's long life of usefulness, and even in death to make him repent his one sin, and then to forgive him.

Her wild brain at last imagined him dead, and in her frenzy she called for the Bible, turning its pages in rapid succession, searching for a place where God might have said that to spend a useful Christian life, failing only in one point, would not keep a soul out of heaven. She could not find it, and in agony she would grasp hold upon any one who went within her reach, telling them in burning words of the one sin of her father, and begging them to tell her where his soul was now that he was dead. Her father she did not know, and to him, too, would she put her questions.

To keep her ravings a secret was impossible, and they were freely discussed in many homes.

Few, however, believed that Mr. Fielder had ever been intoxicated, and the people at large did all they could to make him feel that their trust in his integrity was unshaken. But before their very eyes his hair seemed to grow whiter, his strength to forsake him, and his health to break down. He never left his daughter's room for more than a few minutes at a time; and when the physicians finally told him that May, fair, lovely May, would live, but would never recover her reason, an expression which even his faithful wife could not interpret settled upon his countenance, never to leave it until death should smooth it out.

The day when they carried May Fielder to the State Asylum for the insane was one of the most beautiful of early spring, and the Sunday following was its counterpart. Central church was crowded, and many pitying eyes rested ever and anon on Mr. and Mrs. Fielder, who for the first time in months occupied their accustomed pew. How old and care-marked they looked; how lonesome; surely they missed May; every one missed her.

The choir sang God's praises that morning as if they meant every word. But when the preacher arose a sense almost of desolation spread over the congregation, and seemed to fill them with dread. His face had a restless, anxious, sorrowful look, which remained all during the reading of the lessons.

I shall never forget his text—few will who heard him read it—"Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

The words seemed to go pulsating through the air, and never to cease pulsating.

The preacher entered at once upon his subject; but in the very midst of some of his gladdest praises of the Christian love and its wonderful beauty, his voice would choke and break, and sometimes he would pause entirely, his face twitching painfully, and uncontrollable tears showing themselves.

His emotion had a strange effect upon the audience. People seemed to realize that it was not his theme which so moved him, but that some hidden sorrow was tugging at his heart.

Finally he broke down completely, paused midway in a sentence, passed his hand over his face as if to still its workings, tried to speak, but could not, and, turning to a pulpit chair, sat down amid the most awful silence I ever felt—burying his face in his hands.

This silence lasted but a moment, however, when Mr. Fielder arose and went to the altar railing, there turning to face the congregation. He seemed a man of eighty years, with his white hair and thin countenance. Yet his attitude was erect and graceful, and his voice was perfectly steady throughout all he said. It was this:

"My friends, our pastor can speak no more to you this morning. His heart is too full. He is filled with compassion for me; because the love that he speaks of enables him to love even me, a sinner."

"He knew that I would this day make public confession of a grave sin, and that it is my desire then to abide by the decision of the members of this church."

"For three years I have lived a double life in your midst. My public life you have been pleased to call that of a Christian. Thus can a loathsome thing appear on the outside pure. In the quiet of my home I have put aside this outward purity, and have crushed unflinchingly the hearts that love me best; have bidden defiance to the laws of God, and have many times been as drunk as the poor sot whom you would spurn with your foot while shaking me warmly by the hand."

"I first took whisky at the advice of my physician, as a tonic. I soon reached the point where I took it for mere love of its taste and effects. You all know my punishment. Behind the locked doors of the asylum is one I love—one whom you love. They tell me she will live for years; I can not. Down here she will always wonder where is the soul of her poor old father. But I have made a fresh and uncin-cursed start for heaven, and by the grace of God I shall see the glory break over her face when she gets home, for she will find me there."

He came slowly back to his pew and sat down close to his wife, whose emotion had been uncontrollable while he talked. I think every one in the church felt only compassion and love for both of them.

The choir, with admirable tact, burst forth into an exquisite anthem of praise to God, after which the minister arose, and, stretching out his arms, asked God's benediction on the congregation. The scene which then took place can not be described. The love which covereth a multitude of sins, the love which is kind, seemed to fill all hearts, and the man who had sinned and repented, knew that his neighbor, as well as his God, regarded him only with love.

But that was not the end. Two physicians that day vowed never again to advise a person to take whisky, and many men who had been moderate drinkers, or night drinkers, ceased the habit.

Mr. and Mrs. Fielder are both dead. May still lives, and over her face at times flits the old-time smile, for when she asks, where is my father's soul, many answer, "safe in heaven."

Do you drink whisky? Beware! At the last it stingeth like an adder, and your innocent loved ones will suffer.—Eugenia D. Bigham.

BRO. MOODY AT SEA.

D. L. Moody and others who were on the disabled steamer Spree believe that the vessel was providentially saved in answer to prayer. In the midst of a severe storm, on Nov. 27, the main shaft broke and plunged through the bottom of the ship. The water-logged vessel rolled fearfully, and the decks were washed by the waves. The passengers became greatly alarmed, the indications being that the vessel would sink before help could reach it. On Sunday, at Mr. Moody's suggestion, a prayer service was organized. Every person on board attended, except the officers and crew, who could not leave their posts. Gen. O. O. Howard, who was one of the passengers, says: "It was the most impressive religious gathering any of us ever attended. Jews, Catholics, and all others forgot differences in creeds and denominations. There was no room for them in such an hour. Mr. Moody read the ninety-first and one hundred and seventh Psalms, which one of the Germans translated verse by verse for his countrymen. Mr. Moody offered a most fervent prayer and made a short address. God heard us and answered us. I went to my stateroom to rest after the meeting, and I was asleep when some one touched me. I awoke to find a sweet, fond little German girl, the daughter of one of the passengers, by my cot. She could not understand a word of English, but my daughter had drilled her to speak four English words, which was the message which she brought me, 'The steamer is coming,' and then she added her German hallelujah." Mr. Moody says of the rescue: "There never was a more earnest prayer to God than that of those seven hundred souls on that helpless, almost sinking, ship in mid-ocean Sunday evening, Nov. 27, when we met in the saloon to implore God's help; and God answered us, as I knew he would. He sent us a rescuing ship, and he calmed the sea so that for a week it was as smooth as it is in this harbor, though there were storms all around us. It was the grandest test of prayer I ever knew."

THE HEAVENLY MANSION.

There is an Indian legend of a king who resolved to build the most beautiful palace ever erected on this earth. To this end he employed Jakoob, the builder, giving him a great sum of money and sending him away among the Himalayas, there to erect the wonderful palace. When Jakoob came to the place he found the people there suffering from a sore famine, and many of them dying. He took the king's money and all of his own, and provided food for the starving multitude, thereby saving many lives. By-and-by the king came to see his palace, but found nothing done toward it. He sent for Jakoob and learned why he had not obeyed his command. He was very angry, and cast him into prison, saying that on the morrow he must die. That night the king had a dream. He was taken to heaven, and saw there a wonderful palace—more wonderful than any he had ever beheld on earth. He asked what palace it was, and was told that it was built for him by Jakoob, the builder. In spending the king's money for the relief of suffering ones on the earth, he had reared this palace inside of heaven's gates. The king awoke, and, sending for the builder, told him his dream, and pardoned him.—A Cluster of Pearls.

A HERO.

Many years ago there was a great fire, that burned down a large part of the city of Chicago. Hundreds of homes were swept away, and many strange events occurred while the flames were raging.

A rich lady was hurrying through the crowd of frightened people, trying to save a few of her household goods. She saw a small boy, and called him to her, saying: "Take this box, my boy, and do not part with it for one instant till I see you again. Take care of it, and I will reward you well."

The boy took the box, and the lady turned back to save some more of her goods, if possible.

Soon the crowd came rushing between them, and they were separated. All that night and the next day passed. The lady took refuge with some friends outside of the city, and heard nothing more of the box or boy.

Her diamonds, a large amount of choice jewelry and all her valuable papers were in the box, and, of course, she was in great distress at losing them.

But on the night of the second day a watchman found the boy sitting on the box, almost buried in the sand and dirt that had fallen about him. He had been there all through the long hours without food or shelter. At times he had covered himself with sand to escape the terrible flames.

The poor child was almost dead with cold, and fright, and fatigue, but had never once thought of deserting the precious box that had been entrusted to his care.

Of course, he was amply rewarded by the grateful lady, but the boy who could be so faithful to a trust would be rich and noble without any gift.—Our Little Ones.

THE DOVE OF PEACE.

Come, dove of peace, and fold thy wings
Above each war-stained field.
Let wisdom's hand thy name engrave
On every warrior's shield.

Come to our world amid its din,
Amid its woe and strife,
And breathe an influence round our homes
From Him who is the life.

Come, and the jarring sounds of words,
Unloving, harsh, untrue,
Shall cease, and over all the earth
The song shall wake anew,

Which over Bethlehem's plains was heard
When He to mortals came,
Who yet shall reign, the Prince of Peace,
And not alone in name.

TEMPERANCE.

THE TEMPERANCE PURITAN.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BY EDWARD EVERETT HALE
AT A MEETING OF THE UNITARIAN CHURCH
TEMPERANCE SOCIETY, BOSTON.

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—Anniversary Week, or, as we older people call it, "Election Week," would not be rightly closed without this meeting. It is the direct result of the work of the Puritan fathers of New England, as the Unitarian church itself is the child of the Puritan church, and thus has the right to summon you that it may consult with you in regard to the cause of temperance and purity. I do not like to have any misunderstanding as to the true meaning of that great word which built this country, and on which our institutions are founded—the word "Puritan."

The word "Puritan" means a man who can keep his body pure, a man who knows that the pure in heart see God, a man who knows that wisdom from above is first pure. And, from the Pope of Rome on the one hand down to the hardest radical on the other, the man who knows how to keep his body under, to keep it in subjection, is, and always has been, a Puritan. Those worthy men from whom Cromwell organized his Ironsides, when they met in battle the gay courtiers under Prince Rupert, rode them down and rode over them, because they knew how to keep their bodies under, how to keep them in subjection. The same thing is true in the history of this country. What is it that made a few white men stronger than those wild troops of savages around them? What is it but that they knew how to keep their bodies pure? Miles Standish and the rest of them were more than a match for these savages; but I fear that it might be said that the white man's whisky has gone farther than his powder did among the host which he was to subdue.

From the moment of the first court which was held in Charlestown in the cabin of the "Arbella" down to this moment, the legislation of Massachusetts has been based on the central principle that the State has a right to say that the sons and daughters of the State, that the little children born into its arms, shall be pure. And, if anybody asks whether the Puritan spirit is dying out, I should like to put him into the place where I was twenty-four hours ago, and to have had him hear the appeal which a Puritan of honorable family, a descendant of a Puritan, the great-great-grandson of a Puritan president of a Puritan college, made, and to have heard the enthusiasm with which that appeal was received, when he spoke with burning words of contempt of any political party that should try to lift to the highest seat in the government a man whose personal habits were not pure. Then and there we knew that the Puritanism of New England is not dead to-day.

But, if anybody asks us if in the history of the world that old lesson is repeating itself, he has only to take the history of the last war between Germany and France. How is it that, with all the ability of the French people, with all the keenness and finesse of the military authorities, France gave way before the Teutonic legions, before the Germans, as they came in? What did that mean? It meant that the Frenchman cannot keep his body down as the German can. That is, the average Frenchman gives way before the average German. I think that the history of this last war shows that France was crushed by brandy and absinthe, by drunkenness and adultery, and not by the march of the German forces. That is the lesson which history is teaching, and it is the lesson which every practical man will repeat to you to-day.

I see young men before me who are destined to great success in the fields of literature and of science, if they keep their bodies pure. I shall not have many occasions to appear before such an audience as this; but, if this were the last word that I were ever to speak to any audience, I should like to say that, after a long life, in which I have been acquainted with many men of science, many men of letters, many men whose business it was to work their brains, and to work them hard, even harshly, I can testify to you, as they would testify to you, that, if the brain is to do its work, if it is to be kept at work, if it is to produce the marvels of literature, the spirit and body must be kept pure, kept under subjection. You know how many instances there have been where the noblest promise has been flung away because the purity of life was not there. There was not that personal purity by which alone one sees the love of God.

Especially is it the business of a body like this to build up the cause of personal purity, the cause of temperance. By whatever method you use, you should teach boys and girls, young men and women, how they are to keep their bodies pure, to make them living temples of the living God. Certainly, we have a great deal to encourage us in the steady drift and movement of society. We have some discouragements. It is a pendulum swinging backwards and forwards, of course. Such is the law of all progress, and no person of sense would ask that the nineteenth century should be reserved or set aside from the action of that law. It is a great deal to have gained what we have gained, and that every century is standing on higher ground and is able to look on a broader prospect. It is conceded so far as this: it is understood that no woman must ever be tempted to drunkenness. It would be easy, I think, to get a license law passed by the sixteen directors of Boston—the sixteen men who manage Boston in the interests of liquor—to pass a law that no women should ever be permitted to drink intoxicating liquor. It is still farther settled that on the days of election, when the right use of men's brains is necessary for the welfare of the community, no man shall drink intoxicating liquor. It is also settled that no boy and no girl, no person under the age of 21, may ever buy at any hour of the day or night a drop of intoxicating liquor. That much is gained. I may say, last, though not least, that it is settled that no clergyman may ever drink liquor. I think we have advanced a good deal when we have come so far. I am glad to be one of those who are permitted to speak on a public occasion like this, in hopes of bringing up the rest of the community to the standard to which these favored classes have been brought.—Herald of Health, for December.

Did you ever hear of a saloon-keeper who concerned himself with probable consequences of sending a man home to his family infuriated with the liquor which he had sold him?

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

DAILY READINGS.—M.—Ezra 1. T.—Jer. 29: 8-14. W.—Isaiah 44: 21-28. T.—Dan. 9: 16-25. F.—Isaiah 51: 1-11. S.—Psalm 126. S.—Luke 4: 14-21.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The proclamation of Cyrus.—vs. 1, 2. We need go no farther than the first verse of our lesson for two or three most important suggestions. (1.) The Lord's word will always be fulfilled, whatever obstacles may seem to lie in the way. The return of the Jews to their own land, "not with haste . . . not by flight," had been prophesied by Isaiah 140 years before. Amid all the uncertainties of life we can cling to every promise of God as to a rock that cannot be moved. (2.) The Lord can stir up the hearts of rulers at will. Is it not possible that a second Lincoln may yet arise whose spirit God will "stir up" to write another decree of emancipation which shall free the captives of strong drink and give us national prohibition? (3.) While God may work wonderfully, it is always in natural ways. Slowly but surely he had been preparing, through his providential dealings, by putting down one dynasty and setting up another, for the return of the Jews from their seventy years' of captivity. Cyrus was now reigning on the throne of the slain and deposed Belshazzar. So God will eventually put down every party in our land which is founded on policy instead of principle, and thus prepare the way for a new era of truth and righteousness. "Hath charged me," etc. Doubtless Cyrus had been shown the prophecy in Isa. 44: 28, and accepted the divine commission with a ready obedience which might shame many who are living in the full light of the Gospel age.

2. The call for volunteers.—vs. 3, 4. This was to be no forced emigration, like that of the Jews at the present time from Russia. All who desired to stay in Babylon were free to do so; and those who loved their own ease better than they loved Zion, would naturally prefer to remain behind rather than join an expedition which, though it set out under royal auspices, would be likely to entail on those connected with it more or less of hardship and privation. Some were detained by their poverty; some by their riches, and some by ties of duty. The same causes, at the present day, hinder many from entering the missionary field. Men and women, ready to give up all their home comforts and advantages for the sake of carrying the Gospel to the heathen, are but a forlorn hope compared to the great bulk of Christians who elect, or are elected, by circumstances over which they have no control, to stay at home. The proclamation farther commands that wherever there are captive Israelites who are hindered by poverty from joining the expedition, "let the men of his place help him with silver and with gold, with goods and with beasts." In almost every church may be found one or more who are longing to labor in foreign fields, but are poor and unable to go unless their brothers and sisters in the church help them with their "silver and gold," and needed "goods." Too often this is not done, and thus the churches overlook or fail to utilize much good material. If this plan were generally followed, and every church became a missionary church, having each its little band whom it is pledged to support, "giving to missions" would not only receive a great impetus in money and in laborers, but also in the revival of missionary interest consequent on direct communication and personal touch with the work and the workers. But let it be noted that our gifts must be free-will offerings. Not how little, but how much, can I give? should be the question. In the divine economy there is work for everybody, and in a certain sense, all must be volunteers.

3. The proclamation obeyed.—vs. 5, 6. God first stirred up the heart of Cyrus; then he stirred up the hearts of the people. It was a divinely inspired movement from the beginning, and on that account bound to succeed in spite of the fifteen years' set-back which the work received through the machinations of their enemies. "And all they that were about them strengthened their hands." Their heathen friends and neighbors, either from loyalty to the king or personal goodwill towards those who had dwelt so long among them, contributed generously to their needs; a dim foregleam of the then far-distant day when the proclamation of a greater than Cyrus should be joyfully obeyed, and heathen lands give of their gold and silver for the Lord's service.

4. The sacred vessels restored.—vs. 7-11. Seventy years before, Nebuchadnezzar had carried away the vessels of the temple and dedicated them to his god. They were thus kept safely until the set time to favor Israel had come.

Some practical suggestions that we may gather from this lesson are (1.) To every dark night of affliction there succeeds a morning. (2.) The world is helping on the spread of the Gospel. Every new discovery by which time and distance are practically annihilated lend wings to the message. (3.) God never lacks for ways and means to fulfill his promises when the hearts of all men are in his hands to move as he will. (4.) God will do far more for his people than they ask or think. To be freely allowed to depart to their own land would have seemed to these exiled Israelites all they dared hope for. So mere release from the bondage of sin is all that many pray for, and are joyfully surprised when they find what riches of blessing for this world and the next go with it.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

—The latest statistics of Christian Endeavor growth in Australia are: Victoria, 200 societies, 8,000 members; South Australia, 58 societies, 1,650 members; New South Wales, 51 societies, 1,650 members; Queensland, 10 societies; New Zealand, 10; Tasmania, 10.

—Up to a few weeks ago the United Society officials knew of no Christian Endeavor societies in Madagascar; now they know of 30. A few weeks ago Secretary Baer knew of no societies in France; now word has come that the good seed has quietly grown there, and has sprung up in several Parisian "Societes d'Activite Cretienne," as well as societies at St. Quentin, Les Ternes, and elsewhere.

—One of the most flourishing and useful societies is connected with the Madanapalle (India) high school for boys. A recent report says: The members of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor connected with this school have been very active in preaching the Gospel. About 16,000 people were reached through their efforts during the past year.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—Dr. Wells and the Oberlin Conference of Ministers emphasize the continued interest in the question of short pastorate. Dr. Wells has an admonition to pastors, as well as churches, on the subject. Theological graduates who start out with the desire for a short pastorate at the beginning are likely to get what they wish, and, perhaps, a good deal more.—Advance.

—The additions to the Union Park church (Chicago) during the past year, according to statements made by the pastor, Dr. F. A. Noble, on Sunday morning, have been very large: To the home church and its branches, all together, on confession, 169; by letter, 88; total, 257. This is a record for which to be profoundly grateful, and one to give courage to both pastor and people.

—Rev. Dr. Pond, pastor of Bethany Congregational church in San Francisco, writes: "One-third of the 336 members of Bethany church, of which I am pastor, are Chinese believers."

EVANGELICAL.

—Mr. Moody has received an urgent invitation from the London Evangelistic Committee to conduct another mission in London before returning to America. He has, however, felt obliged to decline, giving as his reason that interests in Northfield and Chicago require his attention there; that he is unwilling longer to be separated from his family, and that he would not like to undertake it without the assistance of Mr. Sankey, who has already been obliged to come to this country. He also says that such a mission, in order to be effective, would require a longer time of preparation than would now be possible.

—On the Pacific Coast there are now resident over 2,000 Christian Chinese, who have been received into membership in the various evangelical churches. That they are genuine converts, and some of them persons of great worth, cannot be doubted. Many converts have returned to their own land, to be engaged as missionaries there.

—It is reported that the work of evangelizing the Jews in Palestine, and especially in Jerusalem, is making more marked progress than heretofore, because of the new undenominational mission near the Jaffa gate of the Holy City, and conducted by the converted rabbi, A. Ben Ollel.

—The extent of the work being done under the auspices of the American Missionary Association in California mainly is indicated by the following statistics: They have 19 mission schools, 38 teachers, 1,176 pupils, 222 who have abandoned idolatry, and 178 professing faith in Christ.

LUTHERAN.

—The new Lutheran Book Concern building will be dedicated on January 18, 1893.

—The ratio of churches to the adult population in several of the more important Lutheran countries of Europe is as follows: Denmark, one in 400; Prussia, one in 435; Hanover, one in 370; Wurtemberg, one in 337.

—The General Council will send, in the near future, two men to their field in Rahjahmundry, India.

—In pursuance of the Pan Slavonian policy of the Russian government, all the Lutheran employes on the railroads of the Baltic region have been replaced by members of the Greek church.

—German Lutheran missionaries have met with gratifying success among the Mohammedan Malays on the Island of Sumatra, 12,000 of whom have become professing Christians.

—Sweden, by statistical exhibit, is shown to be thoroughly Protestant. Out of a population of 4,774,409, only 810 are Roman Catholics, or 16 out of every 100,000; and next to it in this respect is Norway, which is under the same sovereign, and has only 512 Roman Catholics out of 1,818,853 inhabitants, or 27 out of every 100,000. In both of these countries the mass of the population adhere to the Lutheran church.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—Elm Park church, of Scranton, Pa., which had just been completed at a cost of $200,000, and which was to have been dedicated on the 18th inst., has been burned to the ground.

—Bishop Joyce preached at Wesley's chapel, London, England, Nov. 20. The service was an unique one. Travelers from different parts of the world were present.

—Mrs. John A. Logan has selected Iowa Circle, in Washington, as the site for the monument to General Logan, for which the government appropriated $50,000.

—Mrs. O. H. Tiffany and family have removed from Minneapolis, Minn., to Brooklyn, N. Y.

—Bishop William Taylor left New York, per steamer City of Paris, on the 7th inst., on his return to Africa.

—The Desplaines Camp-meeting Association has completed arrangements for next year. The camp-meeting of the two Chicago districts will begin July 21, 1893, and close August 2. This will be followed by the camp-meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Holiness, to be conducted by the president, Dr. Wm. McDonald. Prominent Methodists from all parts of the world, including Hugh Price Hughes and Mark Guy Pearse, of England, and the president of the Wesleyan church of Australia, are expected to be present.

—Henry M. Stanley, the African explorer, presided over a Wesleyan missionary meeting at Liverpool road, Islington, England, on November 24.

—Bishop Vincent believes it is a mistake to group together for instruction in Sunday-schools children of unequal ages.

—A meeting was held in Cleveland, Ohio, last week, to make arrangements for the International Convention of the Epworth League, in that city, in July next.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The recent statistical quarterly statement of the German empire reports the latest religious data of the country. According to these, Germany has 31,026,810 Protestant subjects; 17,674,921 Roman Catholics; 145,540 other Christians; 567,884 Jews; 562 adherents of other religions, and 12,753 without any religious profession. The total population is 49,428,470.

—The Interior says: "The wealth of the Evangelical church in the United States is $13,000,000,000, and is increasing at the rate of $2,500,000,000 a year. One-half the people of our large cities are outside the pale of the Christian church. Africa has 150,000,000 souls yet untouched. Asia has large, populous districts as destitute to-day as when Schwart, Carey and Duff entered it. Arabia has only two missions, neither of them ours. Japan will furnish native workers, if she only has the means. China has 716 cities, large governing centers, with their proportion of towns and villages and populous country districts, without any resident missionary of any denomination."

—Delitzsch's Hebrew translation of the New Testament is being circulated among the Jews of Persia by the American Bible Society, and missions among these people are sustained by a German missionary society.

—W. T. Stead is translating the Scriptures "into the language of the ordinary man and woman of our own time." Eighteen translators are now at work on the New Testament. The Gospels and Acts will be published this year. The publication of the entire Scriptures will depend upon the reception accorded the Gospels and Acts.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—In a recent address before the Chicago ministers, the wife of Pere Hyacinthe stated that an eruption is imminent in the Roman Catholic church, which it needs only a few more Archbishop Irelands to precipitate. The coming of Mgr. Satolli to America, with plenary powers from the Pope, is said to be in the line of preventing such a catastrophe.

According to a decision given by Judge Hutchinson, the mayor of Chicago has no discretionary power whatever, under the city ordinances, in the granting of saloon licenses. "If the applicant complies with the ordinance," says the court, "presents evidence to the mayor sufficient to satisfy him of his good character, and executes the necessary bond and tenders the proper license fee, it then becomes the duty of the mayor to at once issue the license for the applicant to carry on his business in the place which he has selected for that purpose."

It will also be the recipient and trustee of all the increments and additions which the library shall receive from time to time.

COUNTRY.

Thirteen conductors on the Panhandle line, running between Columbus, O., and Pittsburg, have announced their withdrawal from the Order of Railway Conductors. The reason for their secession has not been made public, but there is a rumor among railroad men that the conductors were given the alternative by the company of leaving the organization or surrendering their positions.

Heavy shipments of gold to Europe, last Friday, caused a flurry among stock speculators in Wall street, and call-loans ranged high.

Six men were killed, while asleep in the caboose of a railway train on the Great Northern Railway, near Nelson, Minn., Sunday, by the running in upon them of a locomotive. Five others were more or less injured.

The imports of specie at the port of New York for the week were $6,637, against $1,085,180 in 1891. Of this total $6,462 was in gold, and $175 in silver.

A combination for the stated purpose of reducing expenses and regulating business has been made by some of the largest heater manufacturers in the country.

An important meeting of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers was held at Jackson, Mich., Sunday, bearing on the World's Fair. About 300 members were present, representing divisions on the Michigan Central and the Pennsylvania lines. They remained in secret session for five hours. The meeting was private, and when a member was approached regarding its object, the general reply was that it was only a social gathering. It is supposed that he spoke Masonically.

HOME AND HEALTH.

CHOLERA. ON WINGS.

One mystery of the dissemination of cholera is disclosed by recent investigations in the Hamburg Medical Society, with respect to its propagation by flies, as reported by a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian. "Nine flies were captured, which had been in contact with infected cholera material, and were placed in flasks containing nutrient gelatine. In six of the nine vessels numerous colonies of comma bacilli were successfully cultivated—of course, from the infection conveyed by the flies." A new danger, and the most difficult to cope with, as yet known, is thus revealed to our health officers, in battling with the insect vultures that eagerly in cholera, typhoid, small pox, or other infectious plagues. It had already been shown that they are carriers of consumption. It has been said that flies are scarce during epidemics of cholera or yellow fever. If this be so, whether from fly cholera or some other cause, the difficulty of dealing with the flies will, perhaps, be within control. At all events, the ingenuity of insect-killing inventors will be in demand for the isolation of hospitals and chambers of infectious disease. — The Sanitary Era.

CARNATIONS IN WINTER.

A Chestnut Hill correspondent suggests that the care of carnations in the house during the winter would make a good paragraph. He has found them troublesome. Possibly, of many kinds of plants, the carnation is the least fitted to be a room plant. Few things are so sensitive in regard to an abundance of light. Even florists who have carnation houses find a great difference between plants grown in old houses, where the laps in the glass by age make a slight difference in the amount of light, and those grown in bright, clear houses. The brightest and best of the houses are always chosen for carnations. Outside of the lack of light, there is no other trouble more than falls to any other plant. — Meehans' Monthly for October.

VARIOUS MATTERS.

Did you ever wish to color frosting at hand with which to do it? Next time try beet juice. Cut a blood turnip beet in thin slices, boil in a very little water, and use the liquid thus obtained. If you would like to have some always ready for use, take more beets and a little more water; but do not boil too long, or the color will be ruined. To a cupful of the liquid add a cupful of granulated sugar; boil twenty minutes and bottle; or you may add a small quantity of gelatine and put in jelly tubs. The syrup is quite as convenient to use.

If you had one of the new lemon squeezers when making those pitchers of refreshing lemonade, last summer, you probably took the lemons, after squeezing, split them open and dried them as quickly as possible; that is, if you did not go farther, and "candy" them. Dried lemon peel should be kept in a glass jar, or, if grated, ready for use, in a wide-mouthed bottle, tightly corked. For flavoring cakes, custard, and the like, it is preferable to most of the so-called lemon extracts.

Have a little hand colander to turn molasses through as you use it. A few experiments may convince you that it pays.

Buy at the drug store a few cents' worth of citric acid—which is obtained from the lemon, and so need not be regarded with suspicion—put in a wide-mouthed bottle, which you should label, and when you wish for a lemon pie and have no lemons, try these recipes:

Lemon Pie, No. 1.—Three good-sized crackers, rolled—not fine. Dissolve one-fourth teaspoonful of citric acid and three tablespoonfuls of sugar in one pint of cold water, and pour over the crackers. Let it stand half an hour and pour it into the crust, which should be short, and grate over it a little lemon peel. Cover with a top crust and bake, or use only one crust and cover with a frosting.

Lemon Pie, No. 2.—Six crackers, one-half teaspoonful of citric acid, one-half pint water. Proceed as in the former recipe; add one cupful of molasses and stir all together, with one-half cup of raisins, one-half cup of currants, a pinch of salt, and some grated lemon peel. Bake with two crusts. Citric acid and grated lemon peel may be used in almost any recipe where the grated rind and juice of a lemon are called for. A very little experience teaches one how much of either to use. — Mary Olds Lakin, in Our Grange Homes.

Thanks to the introduction of Salvation Oil, young bicyclers need not fear a fall. 25c.

With but little care and no trouble, the beard and mustache can be kept a uniform brown or black color by using Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers.

The Woman's Publishing Company, of Minneapolis, Minn., publishers of "The Housekeeper," will pay 5 per cent. as its first semi-annual dividend, January 1st, 1893. FARM NOTES

(From the Farm, Field and Fireside.)

AGRICULTURAL.

It looks as though corn must be higher. Send us in what you know about country road-making.

Have you visited the schoolhouse lately? Was it comfortable? was it cheery?

Give your Congressman to understand that you are in favor of free rural mail delivery and good roads.

The United States imported over $2,000,000 worth of peas and beans in 1891, and nearly $3,000,000 worth of potatoes.

If we had corn to sell and did not need money for immediate use, and had crib room, we should hold for two or three months, at least.

Keep close watch of what the children read. The best "watch" is to supply them with an abundance of pure reading that will suit their taste.

Before you shoot the bluejays that are making your premises their winter home, figure out how many grubs and worms they will kill next spring.

The boy who wants to be a farmer does not care for a work on telegraphy. The boy all interested in mechanics does not care to study the composition of soils; give him a paper or book that has machines in it.

The November returns indicate a very light cotton crop, with short staple, gathered generally in good condition. Local estimates range from two-fifths to four-fifths of a full crop. Many make it the worst crop since 1860.

Many farmers try to till too large areas. If they would put their labor and fertilizers on a smaller surface and use better tools, it would pay them better. Do not work over two acres for what can just as well grow on one.

DAIRY.

Card and brush stabled cows.

Select your poor milkers, and send them to the butcher.

Have a cow that you can get something out of for something.

Continue in one breed, or no one can predict what kind of a herd you will have.

If you look to the milk side of your dairy cows, the beef side will take care of itself.

It is not necessary to have large cracks in the sides of the cow stables in order to give the cows fresh air.

Secretary Gabrilson, of the Iowa State Dairy Association, says he can grow everything he needs upon the farm for making milk.

Experience teaches us that the keeping quality of butter is not as great as it should be, and that the main reason is lack of cleanliness.

Have you ever figured out the gain made by feeding the grain that one cow should have to two cows? If not, why do you keep doing it?

Butter churned at a high temperature will contain more casein and water, and not keep as long as that churned at a lower temperature.

The young calves may be let out for exercise on bright days, but should not be left out till they are humped up in the back like a mad cat on a fence post. Such contraction or contortion means stoppage in thrift.

Clover hay, sheaf oats and corn fodder make excellent milk. Where these are cheap, help high and poor, it is questionable whether it pays to grind the corn and oats, especially if hogs run after the cattle. Each dairyman must figure this out for himself.

POULTRY.

If you will give the same time proportionately to the fowls as to the cattle, we think you will see profits.

Now that eggs are worth two cents apiece, you ought to make at least 100 per cent. profit on every dozen your hens lay, even though you figure the grain fed at retail prices. And that is the true way to do, but credit the eggs at market price, too.

A warm house is a great saving of food, and heat solves the problem of eggs. A few degrees of temperature mark the line between the formation of eggs and no eggs.

Look here, friend! If you are continually growling about the "don't pay" part of poultry keeping, just provide a good hen house and the feed, and let your wife or daughter do the rest.

It is stated that the Rev. Mr. Thompson, of Coleville, Sussex county, N. J., has a Leghorn pullet, hatched on May 6, which began laying on September 25, when she was four months and twenty days old.

A proper selection of food, prepared in a proper manner, has much to do with keeping fowls in the pink of condition, stimulating the egg organs to greater activity, and sustaining the strain on the function of egg production.

Well, instead of sick and suffering; healthy and vigorous, instead of worn-out and weak; bright eyes, clear skin, rosy cheeks—you wouldn't think it was the same woman, and it's all due to the use of a few bottles of

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription.

What this medicine has done for thousands of delicate women, it will do for you. If you're overworked and debilitated, it will build you up—if you're borne down with the chronic aches, pains, and weaknesses peculiar to your sex, it relieves and cures. It regulates and promotes all the proper functions of womanhood, invigorates the system, purifies the blood, improves digestion, and restores health, flesh, and strength.

For all the painful irregularities and diseases of women—periodical pains, prolapsus and other displacements, bearing-down sensations, and "female complaints" and weaknesses, it's the only remedy so effective that it can be guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, you have your money back.

In Northern Mexico, a fight took place between Mexican soldiers and the Garza bandits. The latter (100 strong) defeated the soldiers, 45 in number, and compelled them to surrender. Five refused, and were burned alive in the building. Five of the bandits were killed. United States cavalry were ordered out to capture the bandits, who had crossed over into Texas.

A responsible gentleman, who arrived from the interior of Mexico, reports an epidemic of typhus prevailing in several Mexican cities, including Auguas, Calientes, Zacatacas and the City of Mexico. At Zacatacas the ravages of the disease have been terrible, and while he could not learn the number of deaths which had occurred, it was ascertained that seven physicians had succumbed to the epidemic, which is attributed to the poverty and destitution caused by the drought, and the ignorance and disregard by the inhabitants of all sanitary laws.

Some of the world's people say that closing the World's Fair on Sunday will be "unconstitutional." But the Constitution recognizes Sunday as a day of rest, and so this anti-Sunday-closing argument falls to the ground.

There is no compromise in the declaration of the Cayuga (N. Y.) Presbytery, that "no political party has the right to expect the support of Christian men so long as that party stands committed to the license policy."

The Western Catholic News (Chicago) of last Saturday states that James G. Blaine, who is now very sick, is a Catholic; and, referring to the visit of Mgr. Satolli to Mr. Blaine, a few days ago, says: "It was befitting that the highest dignitary of the church in this country should be the one to reconduct into her fold the most distinguished and best beloved man of his party in America." This would seem to settle the character of Mr. Blaine's religion.

The Federation of Labor Unions, which opposed the W. B. Conkey contract with the World's Fair managers for printing the official catalogue of exhibits, etc., because he employed non-union printers, has won a victory, Mr. Conkey having been persuaded (or coerced) into subjecting himself to the domination of the typographical unions for a period of two years. Our boasted American freedom, founded on the individual right to engage at will in the vocations of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," is rapidly becoming a farce, through the tyranny of the secret, oathbound labor unions.

The Free Methodist Conference of South Dakota thus expresses its opinion of secretism: "To us is given the opportunity of wielding an influence against all wrong—against secret, oath-bound societies, allies to almost every evil in existence and with their bloody hatred to Christ and all that oppose them." The Conference also denounced "parading with or marching after a Grand Army procession." "Against these should we everywhere lift up the true Gospel standard and cry against them with loud voice." These words have the ring of reform. Would that all churches dared to be so brave and earnest.

The "Order of Solons," at Pittsburgh, has passed into the hands of a receiver. At the present time there are about 7,800 members of the order. There is a cash balance in the bank of $14,000. In addition to this there is $250,000 in the reserve fund and $175,000 of other assets, making the total assets $439,000. The appointment of a receiver means the end of the Order of Solons. It has had over four years of existence, being chartered May 26, 1888. Since then there have been instituted 200 lodges. The Supreme Lodge is located in Pittsburgh. This is a hard year on the secret "endowment" orders.

A great political and social upheaval in France is something new in these days, but the past week has witnessed a most remarkable condition of affairs in that republic, owing to alleged gigantic cases of corruption in connection with the Panama Isthmus Canal project. The revelations show that millions of francs have been used for alleged purposes of bribery. Another view of the case is believed to involve a conspiracy to overthrow the present French republic, making the Panama excitement an occasion to hasten and secure the more important measure. This, however, will hardly succeed.

Evanston (Ill.) High School has just been passing through a miniature "reign of terror," exhibiting another instance of the recklessness and disjointed discipline that distinguishes the average young man of the day when he gives vent to his surplus individual freedom of thought and action. These sportive youths caused "a disturbance" (says one reporter) "by ringing electric bells, pounding on steam radiators, and throwing bricks down-stairs. Simple, of course, but effective. School did not keep. Five of the leaders in the exploit were rounded up in a basement by a member of the faculty and have been suspended." Since then another disturbance occurred during the absence of the principal, and two others have been also suspended. Practical "jokes" lose their humor under such circumstances.

"Conservative" New England is waking up, and the radicalism now exhibited in "the land of steady habits" is finely portrayed in the official report of the proceedings of the recent anti-secrecy convention which we print in another column. If there was anything of drowsiness or conservatism in that notable gathering of the best anti-secrecy elements in the Eastern district, it is not manifest in the words and measures recorded. From first to last, these earnest reformers maintained the importance and excellence of the work in which they are engaged; and the influence of this convention will be felt, with the happiest effect, in the future operations of the New England Christian Association. The hands of its clock will not, this year, be turned backward. Progress is the watchword of these Christian men and women. Let them go onward, helped by the prayers and material aid of all who wish them God-speed.

Chicago has seven thousand saloons, and the business is overdone. The result is a declaration of war by the West Side Saloon-keepers' Association upon the brewers, individually and as a combination. The origin of the trouble, it is alleged, is of long standing, but has recently developed an activity that (the saloon-keepers say) threatens the annihilation of their business and the financial ruin of some of them. The casus belli is the establishment, by the brewers, of saloons in every quarter of the city. This, the saloon-keepers say, must stop, and at once. It is added that the greed of the brewers is such, and the competition among them so great, that all vacant stores are being leased by them and fitted up for saloons. These establishments are rented to persons of sufficiently "good character" (sic), and money enough to secure city licenses—often individuals who understand little or nothing of running saloons—and are completely under the control of the brewers. The saloon-keepers' combine hopes to remedy this action by petitioning the city council to pass an ordinance restricting the number of saloons that shall be located in a given district. It is none of our fight; let the battle proceed.

There are new rumors of an Indian outbreak on our Western frontier reservations, because, as it is alleged, the government agents have been remiss in supplying the "nation's wards," the Arapahoes and Cheyennes, with the money and provisions to which they are justly entitled. It is also intimated that these tribes, under the present existing circumstances, are in danger of actual starvation. It is stated in this connection that the government stands in debt, to-day, to every Indian in these tribes about $18. Further, it is alleged that of the money due to these Indians at the last regular payment ($250,000) they received only $187,500, the balance "having been absorbed in fees to pay lawyers for making out the allotment papers of each Indian." So says the Chicago News, which also adds the information that "the rations of beef have been suddenly and inexplicably reduced by one-half;" and that "as usual, the trouble lies with the agencies by which the contract was to be carried out—with the agencies which have the ration-giving in charge and with the system by which the government, instead of putting the full amount of promised moneys right in the Indian's hands, lets him get it through a lawyer and a process of mulcting." Will the Indian understand that this is a Christian nation?

THE ABOMINATIONS OF SECRETISM.

ADDRESS BY REV. J. M. FOSTER, OF BOSTON, ON TAKING THE CHAIR AS PRESIDENT OF THE NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATION CONVENTION, DEC. 15, 1892.

The history of secretism is the history of Satan, the god of "the secret empire." The kingdom of darkness has been at war with the kingdom of light from the beginning. The idolatry of the pagan world, the Brahmanism of India, the Buddhism and Confucianism of China, the lustful superstition of Mohammedanism, and the baptized heathenism of the papacy, as well as the Pharisaic ritualism of the prelate Establishment and the Sadducean rationalism of the socialistic orders, have all their mutually repelling forces united in a bond as close as that once in force between Herod and Pontius Pilate. But Satan carried them into deeper darkness. To-day China has the Highbinders, a sample of which she has imported to San Francisco—an order resorting to murder as a weapon. That country is honeycombed with these secret clans, and the government is powerless to cope with them. Italy has her Mafia, a secret order of cut-throats, a branch of which she has sent to New Orleans. They murdered Chief of Police Hennessy, and a mob struck down eleven of their members. As if regardless of the lesson, they murdered three victims in St. James parish. The conservative Boston Journal, in an editorial, last Monday, said:

"It would seem that the terrible Mafia still flourishes in Louisiana, notwithstanding the stern warning which the citizens of New Orleans gave that its secret assassinations would not be tolerated in that community. The three murders in St. James parish are in line with the known policy of the organization; and as one of the victims lived long enough to reveal the names of some of the assassins, it is to be hoped that the police will spare no efforts to bring them to justice. Like the Chinese Highbinders of California, the Italian Mafia is a dangerous enemy to law and order, and every means should be employed to break it up and punish guilty members for their crimes."

India is covered with a network of secret orders. Nothing but the English gunboats keeps them at bay on the coast, and in the interior they carry on their murderous work without let or hindrance; and every Roman Catholic country, and Protestant, too, has the Jesuit secret order. When Ignatius Loyola organized the Society of Jesus, in 1534, his Satanic majesty took a new departure. The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "Jesuitry is a naked sword, the hilt at Rome and the point everywhere." Pope Clement XIV. abolished the Jesuits, in 1773, and they poisoned him. A Jesuit assassin stabbed Henry IV., May 14, 1610, because he had issued the Edict of Nantes, in 1598. William the Silent, Prince of Orange, was struck down by Girard, a Spanish Jesuit, June 10, 1584, because he helped the cause of the Reformation. Coligny, the Huguenot, was brutally murdered on the night of St. Bartholomew, by the Jesuits; and Abraham Lincoln was shot by Booth, the agent of American Jesuits. In May, 1882, Lord Frederick Cavendish and Secretary Burke were assassinated in Dublin, Ireland, by Fenian Jesuits. They have been expelled from almost every country of Europe and South America, and they have swarmed upon our ill-starred land. They are manipulating the press and the public school system of this country. They have their agents in the White House, the Senate and the House of Representatives, at Washington. They have them in every State legislature and municipal council, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The 100,000 confessionals are so many telephones bringing Jesuit priests into direct communication with all the homes in this land. They have agents in our Protestant churches and in all our religious assemblies. This is our fearful situation.

In 1717 Jesuitry gave birth to Freemasonry. The Masonic lodge is the child of Jesuitry. This overspread rapidly in the United States. One of their members, Captain William Morgan, became convinced that the lodge was a menace to the republic. He said: "I owe to my country an exposure of its danger." He gave the secrets of the lodge to the public, and was abducted and murdered, in 1826. The excitement which followed was intense. Forty-five out of every fifty members left the order. Daniel Webster, Edward Everett, John Quincy Adams, John Marshall, William H. Seward, Thaddeus Stevens, Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner and others sounded the alarm, and Masonry fled to the South and allied itself with slavery. The Southern Confederacy was conceived and brought forth in the lodge. The boys in blue went South and crushed the rebellion, but brought back the lodge. Since then the Masonic order has overspread the North and produced a spawn of secret, oath-bound orders, whose names are legion, because they are many. They are draining the churches of their membership and resources, and threatening the life of the nation. Deacon Sylvanus Town, in an address before an assembly of clergymen, said: "Nor can I understand how it is that you have so little to say, in public, against secret, oath-bound societies, when their influence is so pernicious. They are drawing our young men into their lodges by scores, and, once in, they are rarely ever converted. There is just about religion enough to satisfy the carnal mind; and, as they purposely exclude Christ from their worship, there can be no salvation in them, though they profess to go from the lodge below to the lodge above. We believe the time is coming when we would no sooner allow one of the members of our churches to frequent a lodge, and assist in degrading the manhood of others by denuding them of most of their clothing, hoodwinking and cable-towing them, administering to them their horrid oaths, and then playing the ridiculous farce of raising Hiram Abiff after he is dead and rotten, and then slaying his murderers; I say, I believe the day is coming when we will no sooner allow our members to do these things than we would permit them to enter an idol's temple and worship a senseless god.

"I know you say the lodge cannot be so bad, because some good men, and even ministers, belong to it. Why, brethren, there never has been an evil under the sun, since Aaron made the golden calf, that could not have been justified in the same way. Our fathers, and some of us, used to drink and sell intoxicating liquors. John Newton was engaged in the slave trade. Dr. Nelson came from a meeting, where he was weeping over sinners, and went into his backyard to whip a female slave. So blind and inconsistent is poor human nature when partially enlightened and sanctified."

Hon. S. C. Pomeroy said: "I have long seen clearly that the system of secret orders, now everywhere so popular, is, in its principle and nature, hostile to the whole order of things which our fathers set up in this country. One system or the other will certainly go under; they cannot co-exist and flourish together; they will not permanently co-exist; one will certainly subvert the other; and as I profoundly believe in our order of things, based on the idea at bottom—that every man ought to have a fair and equal chance—I must condemn this hostile and antagonistic system of secret orders, based on favoritism and partiality to their members, and proscription to everybody outside."

Hon. William H. Seward said: "Before I would place my hand between the hands of other men in a secret lodge, order, class or council, and, bending on my knee before them, enter into combination with them for any object—personal or political, good or bad—I would pray to God that that hand and that knee might be paralyzed, and that I might become an object of pity, and even the mockery of my fellow-men."

It is only a quarter of a century since organized opposition to the lodge system was inaugurated. A convention of Christian men met in Aurora, Ill., in October, 1867. Rev. J. Blanchard, D. D., the president of Wheaton College, for years the editor of the Christian Cynosure, the David of the anti-secret movement, who could sling stones to a hair's-breadth and not miss, was made chairman and delivered the principal address, which became the keynote of the long-protracted campaign upon which they were entering. The first National Convention was called to meet in Pittsburg, in May, 1868. Here the "National Christian Association" was organized. Annual conventions have since been held in Chicago, Cincinnati, Boston, and other leading cities. The Christian Cynosure, the organ of the movement, was started in July, 1868. In 1874 Mr. Philo Carpenter offered a beautiful building, 221 West Madison street, Chicago, valued at $30,000, on condition that the Association would raise a corresponding amount to equip it. Rev. J. P. Stoddard was selected as the secretary to secure this money. He was the son-in-law of President Blanchard. Their attitude toward the lodge is well expressed in the words spoken by Mrs. Welch, the daughter of John Knox, when pleading with King James to allow her dying husband to return to Scotland and breathe once more his native air. "He may, if he will conform," was the brutal response to her petition. The Christian heroine rose at once above the emotions of wife and mother. Gathering up the corners of her apron, Mrs. Welch boldly replied: "Your majesty, I will sooner keep his head here!"

The Blanchards are the descendants of John Knox, and Bro. Stoddard is, like Welch, a fearless champion of truth. When Burleigh came on the battlefield of Drumclog unaccompanied, they said: "He is a host in himself." So is Bro. Stoddard. In a short time he had the funds collected to secure a home for the Association in Chicago. From thence the Association has sent out millions of pages of anti-secret literature.

The following official statement sets forth the necessity for this Association: "Though some two-thirds of our globe is governed by rulers who acknowledge Christ, from three-fourths to nine-tenths of the world's population are deluded, taxed and more or less corrupted by secret societies in pagan and Christian lands. God has raised up the National Christian Association to meet and change this fearful state of things, and thus 'prepare the way of the Lord' to come and reign on the earth." It is the Lord's will that Christ is the author of indis-soluble marriage, true religion, and just government; that faith in him is the sole ground of acceptance with God; and that grace, the ground of acceptance, is the sole power of regeneration. We believe, moreover, that Satan is the god of this world, the ruler of its darkness, the god of its evils, the cause of its despotisms, the god of all false religions, the rival and antagonist of Christ, the enemy of God, and of man made in the image of God." The lodge system denies Christ, and worships Satan.

The three fundamental degrees on which all rites—Scotch, York, Egyptian, or other—in all countries are based, exclude Christ altogether; and Templar Masonry, now so popular in this country, is a vile parody on the death of Christ, and a travesty of the Christian religion. In the Rose-Cross degree, in opening the lodge, the presiding officer asks his first assistant: "What is the hour?" He answers: "It is the instant when the veil of the temple was rent; darkness shrouded the earth; light was extinguished; the pillars and implements of Masonry were broken; the flaming star disappeared; the cubic stone gave out blood and water; and the word was lost." (Des Champs, Vol. 1, p. 56.)

This odious jumble of the Bible narrative of the crucifixion, with lying Masonic legends, like the caricature of Christ raising the dead and mock regeneration of the candidate in the Blue lodge, works double; it dignifies Masonry and degrades Christianity. And thus the whole lodge, from base to apex, is really one solid pyramid of blasphemous burlesque of the Christian religion.

JESUITISM A FOE OF OUR REPUBLIC.

A PAPER READ BEFORE THE ANTI-SECRECY STATE CONVENTION OF NEBRASKA, AT WAHOO, OCT. 18, 19, 1892, BY S. M. HILL, PRESIDENT OF LUTHER COLLEGE.

MY CHRISTIAN FRIENDS AND FELLOW PROTESTANTS:—In writing a sermon about a subject as interesting as Jesuitism was absolutely necessary to have a text. But within the entire volume of Holy Writ, where could a text be found suitable? We find not a word about Jesuits, monasteries or nunneries, for such abominations did not then exist.

But outside the Scriptures, in the proverbs of the old Anglo-Saxons, our cousins or forefathers, we have the following very appropriate text:

"The devil was sick;
The devil a monk would be;
The devil got well,
A Jesuit monk was he."

During the glorious of the Middle Ages the light of the dark Gospel was well-nigh obscured. The great army of monks and nuns, originally intended as an instrument of education and devotion, only made the darkness the more intense. All mankind was oppressed; the slavery of superstition and of abject fear held the heart and conscience in fetters. Then the obscure German monk in his narrow cell found the light that is the Light of the World; a spark of that heavenly flame kindled his heart; his faith, at first only a smoking taper, burst out into a brilliant headlight; soon all Europe caught fire and the gleaming light of the Gospel frightened away the gloom and its dismal companions. The king of darkness himself got frightened, or, as the old Anglo-Saxon puts it: he got sick. New means had to be devised; new machines of war invented; the greatest light and fire extinguisher the world has yet seen had now to be brought forth.

Loyola, the Spaniard, came to repair what Luther, the German, had destroyed. Our text then says that the ruler of darkness got well—"A Jesuit monk was he."

It was on the 15th of August, 1534, that the order of Jesuits was organized. True to their instinct as light-haters, Loyola and his six companions went down into a crypt on Mount Martre near Paris. A few wax tapers threw their sickly light around the cavern. Near one of the dripping walls was a statue of a soldier having in his hand the bloody head of a martyr, Dionysius Areopagita, for tradition makes this place the scene of his death. In front of this statue is a rude altar, before which Loyola and his six companions kneel in making their vow. They remain in the cavern till evening, and thus their very first journey as Jesuits was made in the darkness they loved so well.

The avowed purpose of Jesuitism is to put an end to Protestantism. The Pope shall be the sole fountain of power, secular as well as ecclesiastical; he shall be the supreme arbiter in all religious and doctrinal controversies; the right of having an opinion and of advocating it is only his. There shall be but one spiritual ruler, the Pope; and, if possible, but one temporal ruler in christendom, and he shall be the Pope's vassal. That is the ideal plan, as mapped out by the Jesuits; that is their Monroe doctrine, so to speak.

Who shall accomplish this? The Society of Jesus, as the Jesuits blasphemously call themselves, or the soldiers of Christ. They shall accomplish it. And by what means? Any means whatever. Their theory is that nothing succeeds like success. Only that success crowns their efforts then everything is well. All the crimes in the rogues' vocabulary are then good and proper means for them to use. There are, however, two methods most assiduously used by them, and used to the very best advantage. It may seem a paradox, nevertheless the fact is that the great strength of Jesuitism lies in their work of education and of nursing the sick. From the very first they built hospitals and established schools. Their hospital work would put their poorer classes under obligation to them, in their educational work they would gain influence over the wealthy classes, the nobility and royal families.

In pursuing this work they have taken "The World as the Field." No land, no nation, no class nor station is to be free from their intrigues. Within a very short time they were all over Europe. Xavier went to Asia, and in Mexico and the South American countries they had their emissaries. A detailed account of their works in different parts of the world would be too tedious. In France we find their regicides, Clement Chatel, Ravillac, and Damiens. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes was their work. The Huguenot wars, with all their cruelties and disasters to France and to mankind, have their origin in the secret councils of Jesuitism.

In poor Bohemia the Protestants were summarily dealt with, and that whole nation remains to this day in the clutches of Jesuitism. Their work in Bohemia gave the occasion for the Thirty Years War. The main leaders on the Catholic side were the creatures of Jesuitism, even including the Emperor Maximilian and that monstrous warrior, Duke Wallenstein. The Jesuits prolonged that war from 1632 to 1648, and would have prolonged it indefinitely rather than recognize the Protestants as a religious body that should in any way be tolerated.

The splendor of Spain is now no more. That is mainly the work of the Jesuits. They had made up a policy of elevating the house of Hapsburg to the empire of all christendom. That house was intensely Catholic, and was thereby in the hands of the Jesuits. Through them the Jesuits intended to rule the world. The wars of Spain were the result of this policy; so was the Thirty Years War. Their interference in the affairs of England with the gunpowder plot and other conspiracies was the natural result of this policy.

They tried their hand in managing the domestic affairs of Sweden, but the Council of Upsala, 1593, put a stop to their work. Sweden and Poland were then united under one crown in the person of the Catholic Sigismund; the Council of Upsala made it impossible for a Catholic to sit upon the throne of Sweden, and this prepared a way for that greatest of all the Swedish kings, the defender of Protestantism, Gustavus Adolphus.

The curse of Jesuitic rule is very plainly seen in wretched Poland, which now has lost everything, even its name and existence. Sweden would have, in all probability, suffered the same fate had it been embraced in the deathly grip of this giant octopus, Jesuitism.

The Jesuit rule in Portugal brought that country on the verge of ruin. A few patriotic, resolute men arose and by a revolution saved their country.

The Jesuits have never had full control of both politics and religion in any European country, or inside any monarchical government. In Europe they were too closely watched, and the monarchs or their ministers have ever been jealous of their rights, thus keeping the reins in their own hands, at least to all appearance. It was in America, and through a republican form of government, where they succeeded in getting the people so completely hoodwinked that the Jesuits got the monopoly of all power. The Jesuit Republic of Paraguay ought to have its history written by a Washington Irving and a few million copies read in these United States of N. A. Only the united forces of Spain and Portugal were able to expel them in 1767.

But with the increase of the power of the Jesuits, European governments began to distrust them and hate them. One country after another banished them, and the Pope himself was compelled to dissolve their organization, July 23, 1773. Then they found a refuge in Russia, that mother of all despotism. Jesuitism was dead, and yet it lived. There was too much of the devil nature in the order for it to die upon so short notice. But the Pope who banished them died of slow poisoning on the 22nd of Sept., 1774.

Jesuitism was not dead, and it certainly was not asleep. It existed and had a general elected in Portugal, and vigorous measures were taken to have the dissolution revoked. On the 7th of April, 1814, the papal bull of restoration was published, "upon the earnest solicitations of all christendom," as the bull itself states.

But all christendom did not desire its revocation. It was the Catholic church, with the Pope at the head, that found itself sorely in need of this its powerful promoter. The throne of papacy was shaking before the mighty wave of liberty and enlightenment that took its rise on this continent the 4th of July, 1776.

Jesuitism now means papacy. The real ruler of the papal church is not the Pope, but the general-in-chief of the Jesuits. And the plans of Jesuitism are the same now as in the beginning. They have not changed their Monroe Doctrine. And from that we can see what a danger they are to our government. They can not live except they dabble in politics. And their object is to obtain power.

Their attempt to erect a world monarchy under the house of Hapsburg failed. Later on they planned to have this glorious Republic of ours torn to pieces by civil war, and upon the ruins erect a Catholic monarchy in the New World. Napoleon III. of France was their willing and abject tool, and in conjunction with Old England, who has never fully forgiven the wayward son, Uncle Sam, he placed Maximilian on the Mexican throne, and a declaration was drafted by these two powers recognizing the South as a belligerent nation. The Russian Squadron with their sealed orders, lying at anchor in New York Bay, was the rock on which the plans of Jesuitism were wrecked. The gifted Swede, J. Ericson, also brought out his little cheese box about the same time, and Maximilian's throne was ruined by the same bullets that shattered proud old Merrimac.

ORGANIZED SECRECY LEADS TO ANARCHY.

Referring to the charge to the grand jury made by Chief Justice Paxson at Pittsburgh, Pa., about two months ago, in reference to the accusation of treason preferred against the Advisory Committee of the Homestead strikers, the (Dayton) Christian Conservator remarked:

"The points made by the judge are well taken. To allow a secret order to terrorize a manufacturer, prevent him from employing whoever he wants to work for him; when his hands refuse to work for the wages he offers, or to in any way interfere with, or prevent the operation of his manufactory, is anarchy in the degree it is practiced and extended. Employes have the right to quit work if their wages are not satisfactory; to seek by all honorable persuasive means to obtain higher wages; but the moment they attempt violent means to force the employer to comply with their terms they transcend their bounds, and become insubordinate to good government. It is a well-known fact that without resorting to violence they can accomplish nothing, and their secret order falls to the ground as useless. How entirely true are the words of the judge: 'We have reached the point in the history of the State where there are but two roads for us to pursue. The one leads to order and good government, the other leads to anarchy.' The secret societies of the country more than any other element contribute to anarchy and the subversion of good government. In the strike in Dayton, a few years ago, there were church members who engaged in the riot against law and order. Is it not a shame to find churches advocating and making room in their sanctuaries for these unholy orders? The State and civil law seeking their suppression, and churches abetting and encouraging them! How well we feel in our position of opposition to all these law-defying orders that subvert the authority of the state and ruin and corrupt the church."

A MAFIA MURDER.

At Buffalo, N. Y., on the 15th inst., William Argus was found on a street corner, nearly dead from an attack by a bludgeon. In his ante-mortem statement, which the authorities deemed it advisable to take, he said that during an argument in a saloon with a man named Ferguson he had stated that he was opposed to the Mafia, and believed that they ought to be wiped out of existence. A number of Italians were in the saloon at the time, and exhibited extreme anger. One of them called him a liar, but upon his offering to fight left the room with threats of vengeance. After he had left the saloon two men rushed out behind him and with broken expressions begun to abuse him. He replied, and a fight was the result. He was knocked down with a club in the hands of one of the men, but could not name his assailant.

When the police came to investigate the matter it was learned that Ferguson had a large Italian trade. At first he refused to name the men who had attacked Argus, but when he learned that the injured man was liable to die he said that the Italians were Roderigo Fieroso and Celenso Tremo. These two were arrested shortly afterward. It is said that both are members of the Mafia and are sworn to defend their order. When arrested by Officers McCabe and Knabe they attempted to tie a red handkerchief about their arms, but were prevented. This is understood to be a Mafia signal of distress. There is a very strongly expressed feeling against the Italian settlement in Buffalo and another New Orleans outbreak is not improbable.

CONDITION OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Secretary of the Navy Tracy's annual report shows that on the 4th of March, 1889, the fleet of the United States Navy, apart from a few old ships long since obsolete and fast going to decay, consisted of three modern steel vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 7,863 tons, and mounting thirteen 6-inch and four 8-inch guns. Since then there have been added to the navy nineteen new vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 54,832 tons, mounting altogether two 12-inch, six 10-inch, sixteen 8-inch, and eighty-two 6-inch guns, all of which, with the exception of five of the earliest, have been manufactured in this country. Three new steel tugs have also been constructed and put in service during this period.

There are also under construction eighteen vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 93,497 tons, and mounting altogether twelve 13-inch, six 12-inch, sixteen 10-inch, thirty 8-inch, thirty-two 6-inch, thirty-eight 5-inch, and thirty-four 4-inch guns, all of which have been or are to be manufactured in this country.

At the beginning of the present administration the navy was destitute of armor, torpedoes, heavy rapid-fire guns, armor-piercing shells, smokeless powder, and high explosives. Within three years wonderful development has been made in all these until now this government is manufacturing an armor of a new composition superior to anything in the world. One hundred 18-inch torpedoes of the most recent type have been contracted for; rapid-fire guns of 4, 5, and 6-inch calibre have been developed; armor-piercing shells, superior to any of European manufacture, have been produced; smokeless powder, giving better satisfaction than that of Europe, has been developed, and high explosives are now in use better than any adopted by the navy of any other country.

REFORM NEWS.

NEW ENGLAND CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ANNUAL CONVENTION, DEC. 14
AND 15, 1892.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY, MISS ELIZABETH
E. FLAGG.

PRELIMINARY MEETING.

A meeting of the corporate body was held on Wednesday, 2 P. M., in the vestry of the Bromfield M. E. church, Dec. 14, Rev. J. M. Foster presiding.

It was opened with prayer by the President; after which, as there were but seven members present, and ten was the number called for by the constitution to make a quorum, the meeting proceeded informally.

The New England agent, Rev. J. P. Stoddard, presented the question of leaving the Eastern field for work on the Pacific slope, and gave a statement of the progress made during the past year. The Association had become a corporate body, and, following on that step, had come great financial enlargement; so that at this time it can be said that we have within sight fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars with which, eventually, to secure suitable headquarters for the work. The amount received the past year for the anti-secret work in New England had been a little short of $700, excepting a few Cynosure subscriptions. It was voted at the last meeting of the board that $500 be taken out of the funds on hand for necessary expenses, including the $300 needed to make up arrears in the agent's salary.

Secretary Stoddard then presented about a dozen names for additional corporate members, which were endorsed by those present, and recommended to the board.

The proposed change of our agent from the New England field to the Pacific coast was then informally discussed, all making a decided expression of their desire to retain him, and their feeling that his departure at this time would be an injury to the cause in New England. The chairman, at the close, said that the work in this section was not yet thoroughly established, and in the most emphatic manner pronounced it as his own personal opinion that irreparable harm would result if Mr. Stoddard should leave.

It was recommended that the Association request Bro. Stoddard to continue as New England agent, and that it is the unanimous sentiment of this meeting that it is the Lord's will for him to do so, for the reason that the work is not yet firmly established. It was voted that some expression to this effect be made on the records, and also that the form of recommendation be left with the chairman.

Mrs. A. E. Stoddard then made her report, as Secretary of the Board, and the meeting was adjourned to the next day at 1 P. M.

THE FIRST SESSION of the Convention was preceded by a prayer and song service; after which it was formally opened by Pres. Conant, who called upon Rev. W. I. Phillips to offer prayer.

The several committees on Enrollment, Nomination, Finance and Literature were then nominated by the chairman.

Prof. L. T. Townsend was next introduced, and spoke on the theme: "Under what circumstances may Christians enter a secret order?" His chief point was that secret societies, as soon as they became dangerous to the individual or the public, should be investigated and dealt with by law; mentioning, especially, the Clan-nae-Gael, Mafia, the Mormons and Jesuits. He spoke, in closing, of Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship, and said that if the charges made against them on the back of the Convention program were true, they come under the same indictment, and should be investigated by the State.

Rev. James M. Gray, D. D., of the Reformed Episcopal church, was the next speaker. He remarked, in opening, that he took a higher platform than simply the relationship of secret societies to the individual or the state, and proposed to treat the subject from the side of its relationship to the church. It was an exceedingly strong and able address, which the Cyno- sure readers now have an opportunity of enjoying in full.

Rev. E. S. Wheeler, pastor of the Fourth Baptist church, South Boston, then read a paper on "A Practical View of Secret Societies," which closed the evening session.

THE SECOND SESSION.

The meeting opened the next day, at 8:30 A. M., with a devotional service led by Rev. J. P. Stoddard.

A sister spoke beautifully of her love for the anti-secret cause, for the reason that it was the Master's cause.

Deacon Leadbetter gave an account, which was very touching, of his healing when near death's door, in answer to prayer, and how he desired to devote the remainder of his days to the Lord's work, especially against the lodge evil.

A Methodist brother said that, about forty years ago, he heard Dr. Colver speak on the lodge question, and ever since he had been an anti-secretist. The result had been what Dr. Colver predicted it would be if Christians did not bear witness against the lodge evil. Every Christian's duty is to search out the truth and tell what he knows.

This was followed by a business meeting. Rev. W. B. Stoddard reported in regard to Cynosure work. Rev. W. I. Phillips spoke of the need that every anti-secretist should try to bring our literature to the notice of his neighbor. One man in the place where he lived had enlisted two or three boys to distribute literature; and in every house and store for six miles around these juvenile missionaries had left tracts and papers. Such seed-sowing is better than any ordinary lecture.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard then reported what has been already mentioned. Current expenses had been met; there was $3,500 now in the bank, and not a dollar of indebtedness against the society. In view of these great mercies, let us walk humbly before our God. He was gone for twenty-nine days into Canada, during which time he gave twenty-eight lectures. The friends there paid all his expenses and some $75 over. The work had made great progress in Boston: first, through the power of God and his good hand upon us; and, secondly, through the instrumentality of tracts and literature, wisely distributed. He ended with a glowing tribute to our pole-star, the Cynosure.

A brother asked the conditions of joining the society, and how much it would cost. To the latter query Brother Stoddard replied, "As much as it costs to get salvation."

Mrs. Daniel Powers, chairman of the Committee on Nominations, reported that, according to their judgment, the Association would be best served by electing the same officers who had served them so faithfully in the past.

Pres. Conant asked to be relieved from the duties of his office. He was unanimously requested to continue; but as he remained firm in his decision, he was excused by a vote of six to four, and Rev. J. M. Foster was elected in his stead. The two other officers were re-elected, according to the recommendation of the committee.

Bro. Foster, who was gracefully conducted to the chair by the retiring President, said that he considered it a great privilege to lead a forlorn hope, as well as a great honor to be identified with an unpopular cause, especially when that cause must ultimately triumph. His address was full of telling points, and facts of vital importance to every Christian citizen.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard then gave one of his deeply interesting "Chart Talks". When he was through, a man who said he had been a Mason for twenty years arose and asked if Bro. Stoddard was a Mason. On being answered that he was not, though he had been mobbed by Masons, and they had tried to make a Mason of him, the speaker asserted that he knew nothing about Masonry.

A brother then called for inside testimony from some one who had been in the lodge, and Rev. E. T. McIntire, who has taken twenty-one degrees, came forward and spoke of his early life, when he had been a gambler and a sporting man, and addicted to drink and tobacco—vices which he learned in the lodge. He confirmed all Bro. Stoddard's statements, and said that he had taken such oaths, and gone through the ceremonies described. He felt that in so doing he had committed sin and did right to confess it.

He was asked if he could not do missionary work and be a Mason. On answering, very decidedly, in the negative, the defendant of Masonry said, "Well, I can."

Rev. Thomas Elgin, of New York, who had taken three degrees, condemned the secret works of darkness, and also confirmed the statements of Bro. Stoddard.

Rev. A. S. Orne, city missionary, then gave his testimony. He was advised by a high Mason to join the Odd-fellows. He did so, and rose immediately to be chaplain. He was a moral young man; but as soon as he became a Christian he felt that he could not continue longer in the lodge, and live a consecrated life. He believed that Bro. Stoddard had been called of God to denounce and expose the lodge evil; and he wished to say, in closing, that he could not continue in a secret order and be a Christian.

A recess was then taken.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

At 1 P. M. the adjourned meeting of the corporate body was held, Pres. Foster in the chair.

The minutes of the informal meeting of the day before were read by the Secretary, and some additional names proposed for corporate members, which were endorsed; and it was voted that these, with the others, be added to the list.

The Association then proceeded to the election of officers, as follows: Rev. J. M. Foster, President; Rev. D. B. Gunn, Vice-president; Miss E. E. Flagg, Secretary; Lewis E. Lincoln, Treasurer. For Directors: Ezra T. McIntire, Mrs. A. A. Rockwood, Lewis E. Lincoln, Mrs. Anna E. Stoddard, Samuel A. Pratt.

The subject of a change of field on the part of the New England agent was then taken up; but, as there was not time for a full discussion, the meeting adjourned until the close of the afternoon session, which began promptly at 2 o'clock, preceded by a devotional meeting, at which several seceders gave most convincing testimonies. One from Bro. Wilson was, in substance, as follows:

"When I joined a secret order it was the first time I had ever seen my mother in tears. I have rued the step ever since. I joined two other orders, and it was down, down all the time. The night of my first initiation into the lodge was also the first time that I ever drank a glass of liquor. For twenty years I continued to go down, deluded by the devil. I went into a mission in Chicago, and there I received the light; but I fought against it, and it was two months before I at last surrendered to Christ. I walked safely past one saloon, then the next; and that night I got down on my knees and said, 'Now, Jesus Christ, if there is a God, let me know'; and before I got off my knees I knew there was a God. Two weeks from that time he saved me; and, after being cleansed by the blood of Christ, I had no more use for the lodge."

"Stand up, stand up for Jesus," was then sung.

A brother said that for fifteen years he had been looking for such a time as this. He said to his son, who wanted to insure his life for the sake of his family, because everybody else was doing it, "Come out and be a leader." "I love to stand up with men who have backbone enough to stand up for Christ."

Bro. E. T. McIntire then gave his experience. He was converted in New Hampshire, and it took from him all his love for fast horses, diamonds, drink, tobacco and the lodge. But once, soon after his conversion, he attended a lodge-banquet; and his little children said to him, as soon as he got home: "Papa, you have been smoking." It took him a fortnight to get the smell of the tobacco smoke out of his clothes. He said that he had received more encouragement, in renouncing tobacco and the lodge, from his ungodly associates than from professed Christians who were addicted to these evils themselves; because the latter felt that they were inconsistent, and deemed his example a rebuke. As the real nature of the oaths he had taken was hidden from him at the time, he felt at perfect liberty to break them. Christ had freed him. He related an instance of a young man who joined the lodge of which he was a member,—a cultivated, intellectual, Christian young man; but his evil associations dragged him down till he became a miserable sot. He tried to tell him of the evils of Masonry, and get him to leave the lodge. He answered, "You are right, but it is too late now;" and in a week he was dead.

Rev. Thomas Elgin said: "I am sorry I ever went into a Blue Lodge. Have sat at Masonic banquets and listened to the most profane and indecent talk. I am now going from prison to prison, and I am trying to warn our boys against this quicksand, on which so many have been wrecked."

Another brother said he was not a Methodist, but he thanked God for John Wesley. He was not a Baptist, but he thanked God for Roger Williams. He believed in standing up for Christ, against all evil and in the spirit of love.

A man in the audience, who said he was a member of three or four different secret orders, then arose and asked under what auspices this Convention was held. He said that he was a member of the Grand Army that abolished slavery, and referred to the good done by Masonry during the war.

A ministerial brother, from Chelsea, replied that in his church a great many belonged to the Grand Army; and, a few Sundays ago, seeing a good many vacant seats, he made inquiry, and found that they had gone on the grand excursion of the G. A. R., to Washington. He saw the train as it started off, and was disgusted with the drunkenness and profanity of the scene. He inquired of some of his G. A. R. members why they did not go on Monday. They replied that they had to go with the post; from which he drew the natural conclusion that the lodge could lead them out of the church, but they could not lead the church into the lodge.

Bro. P. Bacon said: "The Lord makes Antimasons." He believed his mother was one, for he was born in 1828, the time of the Morgan excitement, and he had always been opposed to the lodge. Feeling that he could not be a Christian and let this system of darkness go, he wrote a letter to the Congregational church of which he was a member, asking that a committee be appointed to look into the matter. The case was presented for two years, and tabled by a professed anti-secretist. He spoke of a Congregational minister who admitted that Morgan was executed by the Masons, but could not see that there was any harm in it.

An address then followed by Rev. J. F. Packard, on "Odd-fellowship as a Religious Institution," filled with facts, many of them drawn from his own personal experience.

To the great regret of the Convention, one of our principal speakers, Benjamin F. Trueblood, Secretary of the American Peace Society, could not be present; but he sent a most ably written paper on "Fundamental Objections to the Secret Society System," which will appear in the Cynosure.

Rev. W. I. Phillips then spoke, with special reference to the Good Templars and the G. A. R. He was followed by Rev. A. A. Hoyt, on "Christ or the Lodge—Which?"

Miss Helen Richardson, who is engaged in Rescue work in Bombay, India, and associated with Rev. Wallace J. Gladwin, was then called to the platform and listened to with much interest. She said that Masonry was getting an exceedingly strong grip on the new converts in India; that it fostered the drink habit, and corrupted the courts; giving an instance of which she had personal knowledge.

She was followed by Rev. W. B. Stoddard; after which the session closed.

Immediately afterward the adjourned meeting of corporate members was called to order by the chairman.

J. A. Conant said that he was as strongly in favor of retaining Brother Stoddard as anyone. He did not see how we could spare him, but, if it was God's will, we could let him go.

Bro. P. Bacon said that Brother Stoddard understood the requirements of the New England field as no one else could, and, if he should leave now, it would necessarily involve a break in the work.

The Treasurer spoke of the peculiar adaptability of our present agent for raising funds, as a point to be considered. There was much wealth in New England, and he commanded the confidence of men who could make large donations to the cause.

Brother Thompson spoke of the different conditions prevailing at the West, and the fact that Mr. Stoddard knew how to deal with the conservative New Englanders, as a reason for retaining him.

Bro. Pratt asked Bro. Stoddard if he had felt any special call to go to another field; to which he received a decided answer in the affirmative.

Pres. Foster then said that the decision lay with Bro. Stoddard, and not with the Association. If such was the Lord's will, he should tell him to go, though he still felt firmly persuaded that he ought to stay.

Mrs. Stoddard then stated that when the call came from the Pacific coast they felt at first like saying, "No". But when they came to the point where they were willing to give up their own personal inclinations in the matter, the call had only seemed to grow stronger. The question had been asked, What induced them to go? She wished it to be understood that it was no money consideration. Though New England was her native section, where she would naturally prefer to stay, the impression was strong on her mind that they ought to go.

C. B. Knight then said: "I know something of the Western country. One of my Sabbath-school boys is now in Dakota, and is building a university out there." He believed that whatever decision Brother and Sister Stoddard should come to, they would follow the divine guidance. He alluded to the importance of the Southern field, and said our flag must cover the world.

Bro. Stoddard said he would give his final answer at the close of the evening exercises.

THE CLOSING SESSION

opened with a devotional service, led by Mrs. A. A. Rockwood.

Mrs. A. J. Gordon, President of the Boston W. C. T. U., was then introduced, and spoke most forcibly and eloquently on the dangers to the church and family resulting from the secret lodge system.

She was followed by Miss Flagg, editor of the Home Light, who spoke on "Woman's Place in Reform".

A stirring address followed, from Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason, whose voice has grown familiar to our conventions, with its ringing appeals for righteousness and purity, on "Masonry from a Woman's Standpoint".

This closed the convention.

BRO. J. P. STODDARD

then gave his final answer, to the effect that both he and his wife felt that the Lord called them to go to the Pacific coast; but he requested to continue as New England agent three months longer, in order that suitable preparations might be made for filling the vacancy; which request was unanimously granted.

Resolutions of thanks were passed to the Bromfield M. E. church, for the use of their spacious and beautiful audience room for our convention; to the attentive brother who has been so considerate of our every need; to those who have addressed us in words of eloquence and wisdom, and to those who have kindly extended the hospitality of their homes. A resolution of thanks was also passed to the newspapers which had reported the convention.

REV. WM. FENTON IN MINNESOTA.

KERKHOVEN, Minn., Dec. 23, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Benson, in this State, has six churches: three Lutheran, one Congregational, one Episcopalian and one Romish; six saloons and about as many secret societies. There was no preaching service in any of the churches last Sabbath day, Dec. 18, except in the Congregational, in which the pastor, who is an Odd-fellow, preached in the morning about the late Jay Gould and in the evening about the Pyramids of Egypt. The way was therefore clear for an Anti-masonic meeting in the town hall; accordingly there was a large meeting in the evening in that hall.

The Lutherans are having a hard fight against the lodge to preserve their churches from being devoured by lodge demonology.

Upon the presentation of my credentials to the Odd-fellow pastor he plainly declared that he was flatly opposed to my mission and should work against me, taking credit to himself for his plain statement of his position. He wears the monogram C. E. attached to his three-links on his vest. When he was informed that Odd-fellowship claimed to be founded upon the Egyptian Mysteries, he impudently denied it. When asked if he was familiar with the principles of Odd-fellowship, the Manual of Odd-fellowship, etc., he declared that he was. Subsequently the Manual was placed in his hands, opened at the place where the claim is made that Odd-fellowship is founded upon the Egyptian Mysteries. After reading it he would have denied the authority of the Manual, but he was shown the preface of the book, where the Grand Lodge of the United States endorses and commends it to the fraternity, and that commendation is signed with the names of the leading Odd-fellows (Dimber Dambers and Crank Cuffins) of twenty-seven of the United States. No doubt Odd-fellowship, like Freemasonry, may be at least partially identified with the Gypsies of England, and the term Odd-fellow, euphonious, and synonymous, with the terms "Dimber Damber" and "Crank Cuffin" applied to the worthy (?) patriarchs of the Gypsies. The Gypsies of England being of Egyptian origin, there may be as good reason to found the origin of Odd-fellowship upon their neighbors, the Gypsies, as they have for founding it upon the Mysteries of ancient Egypt. The pastor's attention was directed to the statement in the Manual that souls are regenerated, or born again, by means of Odd-fellowship in the lodge. He then attached the same importance to Odd-fellow regeneration that he did to regeneration in Christianity. That he did so was a matter of course, because his idea of Christianity, as his badge indicates (the Christian Endeavor monogram attached to his Odd-fellow links), is degraded to the lodge level of the Mysteries of ancient paganism. Accordingly he undertook to defend his idea of the unholy alliance by observing that the 25th of December, a pagan day, taken from sun-worship, is celebrated by Christians as the birthday of Christ; and Christians use pagan names for the days of the week. And thus my eyes are becoming more and more widely open to the fact that the churches are fast becoming paganized by lodge domination. And such is the influence of the "lying wonders of Satan" in developing the workings of the mystery of iniquity spoken of by

CORRESPONDENCE.

MASONRY AND THE HOME.

[Extracts from a recent letter of a valued subscriber and correspondent.]

December 13, 1892.

DEAR —: I guess you think I am losing interest in your work, but indeed I am not. I had hoped to be at the convention in New York, but sickness prevented. I seem to have the "sick wind" blow my way a great deal during these last six months; but the children pulled through nicely, and I do not complain. [They had diphtheria, blood-poisoning and scarlet fever.—EDITOR.] But I have done a little good, I hope, in that time.

I had a young man, a grocer, tell me on Monday that I have saved him from joining any secret society. His father is a Mason, and he had always thought it right; but he is a good Christian, and is greatly interested in your work. I gave him this week's Cynosure.

I will send you a Ledger to-day, containing an article in regard to Dr. Duncan McGregor. In one of my last summer's Cynosures I saw (if I remember rightly, it was in a Washington Letter) reference made to him. There isn't anyone I know that will lie as fast as he to shield his Masonic lodge. I thought, when I heard him preach his Masonic sermon to — Lodge, last February, I could scarcely restrain my anger. In one passage he spoke of General Washington going on horseback to his lodge, after the din of battle, to gather sympathy and comfort from his brother Masons. I was disgusted, and so was the young woman who was with me; and a great number of the older members left the church before the services ended. On the following Sunday he tendered his resignation from the pulpit, saying, in a very bitter tone, that he would go to preach where fraternal societies would be appreciated.

Last winter he preached a sermon, setting forth the great antiquity of the Masonic lodge, old, gray-haired Masons listening as intently as if the doctor was telling the truth, instead of such a number of terrible falsehoods.

My husband and I expected to start to-day for the New England Convention, in Boston; but our oldest daughter was taken sick with pneumonia, and so we cannot go. Although my husband says that my National Christian Association friends are cranks, still he is anxious to meet some of them.

It is lodge first, and home afterward. Not only do I see it in my own, but in other homes. I visited a family, last winter or spring, who live in a prominent street. Their house was beautifully furnished, and they were receiving friends for a supper, given in honor of their little boy's birthday. The mother, who is a frail, delicate woman, and very lovely, said: "Well it is his birthday party, but yesterday was his birthday. You know his father is a Knight Templar, and last night the commandery met, and he had to be there; and as we could not have a good time without him, we postponed the celebration." So, you see, it is lodge first, all the time. I know the whole bitter lesson from experience.

I hope you will have a good convention. I wish I could have made one of the number. May God's blessing be with those who attend.

THE WEEK OF UNITED AND UNIVERSAL PRAYER—JAN. 1-8, 1893.

117 BIBLE HOUSE, New York, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The churches of our Lord Jesus Christ are again invited to unite in prayer at the beginning of the new year.

After their custom, the Evangelical Alliances of christendom send out the following address to the churches everywhere, together with topics suggested for united supplication. The general subjects for each day are the same throughout the world, while the subordinate topics are adapted to the peculiar conditions of each country. It is hoped that all churches which unite in the observance of the Week of Prayer, remembering its object, and the special promises given to united prayer, will offer petitions, in common with the people of God everywhere, for the common interests of the Redeemer's kingdom.

JOSIAH STRONG,
General Secretary Evangelical Alliance for the United States.

BRETHREN, BELOVED IN CHRIST:—Once again we invite you to observe the "Universal Week of Prayer." Our new year begins with the Lord's day. May this be a "token for good" to us all! May we, like the beloved disciple, be "in the Spirit" on the Lord's day!

We have much to pray for, and much to encourage us in prayer. Never since the world began has there been such a century as that which has passed since William Carey bade the church attempt great things for God, and expect great things from God.

We have, also, much to plead. Much has been given, but much remains to be bestowed. We shall see greater things than these.

Let us seek to realize God's purposes as they are revealed in his Word. Let us hold fast to God's promises as they are declared in his Son. Let us expect God's performances to be exceeding abundant—above all that we ask or think.

If in this spirit we keep our Week of Prayer, its observances will be fraught with blessings both to the church and to the world.

We are, in the name of the Evangelical Alliance, yours in the service of the Lord Jesus.

(Signed by the officers of the United States branch, of the British organization, and of the following branches: Canada, New Brunswick, France, Switzerland, Germany, Netherlands, Denmark, Italy, Spain, Turkey, Greece, Syria, South Africa, Japan, China, and New South Wales.)

LITERATURE.

THE ARMENIANS; OR THE PEOPLE OF ARARAT: A brief historical sketch of the past and present condition of Armenia, the Armenians, their religion, and missions among them. By Rev. M. C. Gabrelian. Pp. 220.

This attractive volume is written by a young Armenian who has been for some ten years studying in this country. In the preface he acknowledges his indebtedness to the late Dr. H. J. Van Lennep, the returned missionary, to Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, and to Wheaton College, where he was for a year or two a student. He writes with enthusiasm upon the ancient history of his fatherland, as the cradle of the race after the Flood, and traces the Armenian record through sacred and profane history to their present deplorable condition under the "unspeakable Turk." The religious story is one of equal interest. The conversion of the Armenians in the time of the early Christian church, their decline into ritualism and formality, and the success of modern missionary effort among them form a remarkable chapter in the history of the religions of the world. A supplementary chapter gives some account of the inscriptions unearthed in Armenia, which have been translated by Prof. Sayce, of Oxford, England. America is in many ways joined to this ancient race, and this volume ought to find many readers in this country.

THE ENGLISHMAN'S BIBLE. How he got it and how he keeps it. By Rev. J. Boyes, M. A. Pp. 159.

This is the fourth edition of this handsome and valuable little work by the clergyman to whose kindness the readers of the Cynosure are much indebted for his contributions from England. The history of the introduction of Christianity into Great Britain is told in these pages in simple but attractive style. Portions of the Word of God were translated into Saxon in a very early day. One such translation is believed to be by Augustine himself. So that this Light of the ages early and quite continuously gave its beams to English life. With Wickliffe it began to be a power, and after many had suffered, it was put under protection of law by Henry VIII. and thousands of copies circulated. Very appropriately the last chapter sums up the whole story as in a moral, by showing that to this matchless book England owes its greatness. This volume is to be commended to our young American readers, who should above all things be familiar not only with the book itself, but also with its history.

Any one who is interested in the land of oranges and olives, and desires a copy of a handsome illustrated pamphlet on Southern California, can secure one by writing to the Secretary of the Bureau of Information, Los Angeles, Cal., and enclosing a two-cent stamp.

DECEMBER MAGAZINES.

The Converted Catholic, published monthly in connection with Christ's Mission, 142 West Twenty-first street, New York City, is edited and issued by James O'Connor, formerly a Roman Catholic priest, but now an earnest Protestant evangelist. Its object, as well as that of the mission, which is also conducted by him, is to bring the Gospel to the Roman Catholics, in order that they may be converted from the error of their ways by the preaching of Christianity. The mission meets with much encouragement, and the magazine ($1.00 a year) is the record of numerous conversions, as well as a faithful expositor of the errors taught by the Romish church. This mission has been in operation since 1879, and deserves every encouragement.

The December issue of the India Watchman, edited and published at Bombay, India, in the interest of pardon for sinners, purity for believers, and power, through the Holy Ghost, for all sincere and earnest Christian workers, is, as usual, fully up to its mission, and replete with interest. Rev. W. J. Gladwin, the Cynosure's warm friend and correspondent, is the conductor of this excellent magazine, which we know is doing effective missionary work among the benighted millions of India, and arousing the wrath of Satan, by its telling assaults upon Catholicism, secret societies and pagan wickedness. The Watchman costs but 60 cents a year, payable in advance. Address Rev. W. J. Gladwin, Bombay, India.

JANUARY MAGAZINES.

Scribner's for January is largely given up to foreign novelties, finely presented with pen and pencil. Perhaps the most remarkable of these is the first installment of the Impressions of a Decorator in Rome, by Frederick Crowninshield, with reproductions, elegantly executed, of sculptural designs. Not less in interest will be found the story of Lieutenant Peary's recent Arctic Relief Expedition, copiously and curiously illustrated, as told by Angelo Heilprin, the chief of the expedition. A new chapter in the series on The Poor in Great Cities—"The Poor in Naples," is a graphic picture of Italian poverty, by Jessie White Va. Mario, with capital delineations of typical life. Other picturesque articles are: The Wanderings of Cochiti, by Chas. F. Lummis, and Los Caraqueñas, by F. J. Stimson. There is also a pleasant paper—Personal Recollections of Mr. Lincoln, by the Marquis de Chambrun, who visited Washington shortly before the assassination. Among the poetry are Sonnets after the Italian, by John H. Ingham; An Old Lovelatter, by Margaret Crosby, and Experience, by Edith Wharton. Especial interest will center about Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's new serial, The One I Knew Best of All: A Memory of the Mind of a Child, which we commend to all intelligent mothers, who may find in it a reflex of some cherished personal recollection. A famous war correspondent, Wm. H. Russell, recounts the fall of Sebastopol with peculiar interest. The number closes with some well-timed editorials. New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons.

The first number of Worthington's Illustrated Magazine, for January, makes its early appearance, and steps into the arena of periodicals with the self-assurance of a courteous, well-dressed guest entering the drawing-room at court. Certainly it has a clear claim upon public favor, for it vies creditably with many older and already popular rivals. In letter-press and embellishment it is fully abreast of the times. A Night at the Lick Observatory, and the revelations made by the great telescope, partake largely of the wonderful in astronomical science. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore begins a series of personal reminiscences in "Old Virginny" fifty years ago, which promises well. Junius Henri Brown relates his experiences in battle. The Japanese Wedding is a unique account of marriage ceremonies in Japan, written in Japanese-English by a Japanese student. Sir Edwin Arnold contributes A Sultan's Tomb, illustrated. Among the lighter papers are the following stories: In Bassett's Hollow, by Helen Campbell; Little Hannes, mining life in Pennsylvania, by Edith Brower; Misinterpreted, by Margaret Johnson, and Smicker's Watch, by Jno. R. Meader. There are also several domestic departments—"Between You and Me;" "The World Beautiful;" "Gleanings for the Curious;" "All Around the House;" "Health Talks;" "Our Young People;" "Home Entertainments;" "The Shining Hour;" "Knots to Untie," and "Facetiae"—all well-filled and interesting. Published by A. D. Worthington & Co., Hartford, Conn. $2.50 a year.

HUMANE PERIODICALS.

Our Animal Friends, published monthly by the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to animals, at 10 East Twenty-second street, New York. $1.00 a year.

The Humane Journal, which "speaks for those who cannot speak for themselves," published monthly by Albert W. Landon, Rialto Building, Chicago.

Our Dumb Animals, published by Geo. T. Angell, Boston, Mass., monthly.

One or all of these beautiful and instructive periodicals should be found in every Christian home. Each of them is a little missionary in teaching the young the benefits of kindness to all dumb beasts and birds, and elder readers will find in them the secret of making the useful domestic animals more useful, docile and obedient. The study of the dumb creation is full of charming lessons. The relation between man and animals is very interesting, and it is by reading such periodicals as these that we learn to prize the pleasant peculiarities of these household companions.

"CENTURY" NOTES.

What would you do if you were a stranger in London, with no money except a million pound bank-note in your pocket, and some good reasons why you were afraid to go to the Bank of England and get it changed? This is the theme of Mark Twain's story, "The £1,000,000 Bank-Note," which will be printed in the January Century.

A paper of unusual importance will appear in an early number of the Century. It is "A Defense of Russia," written by the Secretary of the Russian Legation at Washington, and presenting the Russian point of view as to certain matters of internal administration which have excited the criticism of the outside world—notably the expulsion of the Jews.

MUSIC.

Trifet's Monthly Galaxy of Music for December contains 48 pages of sheet music, vocal and instrumental, seventeen pieces in all, with words and notes, by various writers and composers. The publishers assure us that, at regular rates, this collection would cost $5 80, but in this form the price is only a dime. Published by F. Trifet, Boston. Sold by newsdealers.

IN BRIEF.

The sum of $10,000 is to be given by the German Emperor for the promotion of ballooning.

Petroleum fire engines are now being made by a German firm. It is claimed that one can be put in operation in two or three minutes.

Science benefits even the elephant. One of these animals was recently placed under the influence of chloroform, and his mouth lighted by an electric lamp, while a carious tooth was filled.

A prize of 3,000 francs has been offered by Baron de Lenval, of Nice, to the inventor of the best application of the principles of the microphone in the construction of a portable apparatus for the improvement of hearing in deaf persons.

Repeated yawning is recommended by Dr. Naegeli, who regards this as a natural massage for certain organs, and of great value in lung troubles, pain from too much wax in the ears, nasal catarrh, inflammation of the palate, sore throat and earache.

Some curious observations, by Prof. Jashow, indicate that our appreciation of food depends largely, if not chiefly, upon the sense of smell instead of that of taste. The subject of investigation was a student twenty-one years old, who inherited from his mother the defect, acquired by her in childhood, of complete absence of the sense of smell, taste and other sensations being unaffected. He was found to be unable to detect any difference between tea, coffee and water. In three trials out of five he confused bitter-almond water and water, but distinguished between ether and water, and ether and ammonia. Fruit syrups were simply sweet, no difference between them being perceived. Cloves and cinnamon were recognized, but mustard and pepper gave only a sharp sensation on the tongue.

ADVERTISING FRAUDS.

Harm, Field and Fireside (Chicago), of Dec. 17, says:

We are continually flooded with letters asking about certain concerns which, on general principles, are frauds, and which may be easily identified as such.

To save our readers' postage and our own valuable time, the following rules will serve for identification:

1. All land schemes, in which lots are offered free on some pretext or other, but in which a certain sum is required to pay for recording the deed and for an abstract of title, etc. The lots are of no value; the price for recording (?) is all the swindlers are after.

2. All free portrait schemes. They make their profit by charging you two or three prices for the frame, and refuse to either return the original or forward the free picture until you buy the frame. Then, when you get it, the picture would disgrace an outhouse.

3. All big offers of salary and expenses paid, to act as agent, travel, act as general agent, etc., made to strangers. None of these are genuine. They all "have a string to them." The object, usually is to get a remittance in advance, either as security for an alleged outfit or some other pretext. The salaries are never paid.

4. All that class of alleged medical associations and physicians who send out circulars to unfortunates, in which the consequences of their complaint are greatly exaggerated for the purpose of working upon the fears of their victims, and thus scaring them into buying worthless nostrums or paying sums of money from time to time for alleged treatment.

5. All concerns which sell certificates of membership which grant the right to buy goods of them at wholesale, etc. Such concerns do not sell goods any cheaper, nor as cheap as others which do not sell memberships. These membership certificates are a fraud, and those who buy them are swindled out of the price paid.

Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup, the old reliable, will cure every case of cough or cold.

Indigestion. Dizziness. Take BEECHAM'S PILLS.

now-a-days, without Pearline. And the strange part of it is, that you should be willing to suffer, when it's only for your loss—not gain.

That needless back-breaking rub, rub, rub isn't saving you anything. It's costing you money. It is simply wearing out the things that you're washing. Why would you rather do it? That is what the women who are saving their strength and their clothes with Pearline can't understand.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1892.

Among the various stratagems of Satan in opposition to God and holiness, and for the purpose of destroying the souls of men, the institution of speculative Freemasonry holds a pre-eminent rank.—LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG, Founder of the first temperance society.

ILLINOIS STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

At the close of the Wisconsin State Convention at Poynette (which ends to-day), or soon after, Rev. M. A. Gault will visit Southern Illinois, lecturing and working in the interest of the Illinois State Anti-secrecy Convention, which it is now proposed shall be held at Coulterville, Randolph county, on Tuesday and Wednesday, January 24 and 25, 1893. He writes that the prospects for this convention are bright, as quite an interest in our reform work has been developed in Southern Illinois.

Further information is awaited, and, if received, will be printed in next week's Cynosure.

THE REMEDY.

In last week's article on "Boys' Brigades," as a remedy for non-attendance on the church and Sunday-school, we intimated that such temporary expedients can never remove an evil that is deep-seated, and has its roots in a general state of society, and that appealing to selfish and unworthy motives will tend rather to aggravate than remedy the evil. We suggested that there surely is "a more excellent way."

But before considering the remedy, we do well to look into the causes that have brought about such a deplorable condition of things; for on the removal of these causes will largely depend our success.

We notice (1), That in Christian families, where there is careful parental training, that not only are both father and mother at the house of God, but the sons, not less than the daughters, are regular attendants on all the means of grace.

2. That mothers, much oftener than fathers, are members of our churches, our congregations and Sabbath-schools, the proportion being nearly three times as many women as men; and that the falling-off of the boys from the Sunday-school is not more marked than that of men from the house of God.

3. That girls, because they are more under the maternal influence, and because not liable to some of the temptations that beset their fathers and brothers, are likely to be, and are, the more constant attendants on the Sunday-school and the church.

But why are the fathers less interested than the mothers in the things which belong to Christianity? And why are the boys more likely to follow the paternal than the maternal example? The answer is not that men are naturally less religious. This is not true. Nor is it that, as a rule, women have more leisure to attend public worship on the Lord's day. The reverse is true.

The causes are threefold. They are: The saloon, the secret lodge, and the Sunday newspaper.

Could we but have such a religious awakening as would lead to the removal of these pestilential influences, there would be no difficulty in securing the attendance of all of our youth in all of the institutions of the house of God. These three evils have a far more direct influence over the male than the female portion of society.

Of the saloon, we need only say that it stands over against the church in direct and deadly antagonism, and that it is the training-school for infidelity and every form of crime and wickedness. Boys whose fathers are in the saloon are not likely, except as mere children, to be in the Sunday-school; nor will their sisters long remain there, unless solicited and aided by influences outside of the family.

The secret lodge (of which Freemasonry is at once the type of the whole system) draws in a more promiscuous, if not a larger, number of men. Not only the saloon-keeper and his patrons are there, but the respectable business man, the officers of the law, the church member, and (sad to say) many ministers of religion. These secret lodges bring the good and the evil into intimate and fraternal relations. They are essentially selfish in their constitution, inasmuch as they teach the primary obligation to aid the members of that particular order, and that this constitutes a higher claim than membership in the household of faith. They are the rivals of the church, in the sense that they teach a false religion, and lead their members, very generally, to hold that they may be justified and saved by the moralities that are taught in the lodge, rather than by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. Boys who are approaching manhood are always influenced by the example of their fathers; and as their fathers have largely dropped off from attendance on the church and the Sabbath-school, finding [their religious instruction in lodge rituals and lodge lectures, rather than in the Gospel of Christ, so their sons will begin to regard Christianity as a superstition, fit for women and girls, but unmanly, and unworthy of their regard. As a direct influence in both perverting and subverting the Christian religion, we believe the secret lodge system to be the most powerful and hostile of all forms of existing evil.

Of the Sunday newspaper there needs little be said. Its malign influence is everywhere apparent. It takes the place of Christian instruction, not, like the lodge, by teaching "another gospel," but by crowding out all due attention to the interests of Christianity. The boy of from twelve to twenty is greatly influenced by it, and kept, frequently, from the Sabbath-school and the church.

The first necessity for a reform that shall bring back and keep the boys in the Sunday-school is that Christians not only withhold their influence from, but that they antagonize directly all these evil influences.

Not many who visit the saloon have any direct influence in the Sunday-school work; but all who are interested in the Christian religion, under all of its manifestations, ought surely to regard the saloon as their common foe.

There are many who belong to the secret orders who do not desire to antagonize the church and its work. They are quite oblivious to the obvious fact that their membership and attendance on these orders is a great wrong to their families, a pernicious example to their boys, and a corrupting influence in the church of Christ.

If all those who are now giving their time and money to establish boys' brigades would give up their Sunday newspapers, withdraw from their secret lodges, and rally around the Sunday-school, to make it a nursery of piety, as well as Bible-knowledge; if they would go out after the poor boys, and see that they were made comfortable and not subjected to the pressure of a pride in dress with which they are not able to compete; if they would, by union and concentration, do away with the unholy rivalries that separate and weaken our churches and Sunday-schools, they would do far more than they are now doing to keep our dear boys from the way that goes down unto eternal death.

THE MORE EXCELLENT WAY.

The apostle Paul, in 1 Corinthians, 12:31, says: "I also show unto you a more excellent way." In chapter 13 he proceeds to describe this way, and in the last analysis makes it to consist in three principles—faith, hope and charity.

The divine plan for the promotion of all moral reforms is, that there shall be, first of all, unquestioned faith in the truth and in Him who is the truth, hope in its final triumph, and love as the great incentive to action. Love, he has told us, is the greatest of all. There is no other power that is equal to this, for there is no other way in which we can reach man's moral nature, and no other plan has the approval of God.

Force may change men's outward conduct, but it never reforms the heart. Appeals to selfishness may change the exterior manifestations of the selfish nature, but they never bring the soul out of bondage to sin.

Misrepresentation always brings a reaction against the cause which it was intended to promote, and an abhorrence of the deceiver. Love, armed with the truth, conquers all things; for God is love. It was this method that gave to the apostles of our Lord such eminent success under such abounding difficulties. They had faith in the Gospel, hope in its prevalence, and unbounded love for the souls of men.

It was this that gave Luther, and Knox, and Wesley their power over the masses. It was the great element of strength in the temperance work of Gough and Father Mathew, and it constitutes the only ground of hope of final success in our anti-secrecy reform.

We need to go back to first principles. We have, doubtless, lacked faith. Amidst numerous obstacles we have had but little hope; and because our good was continually evil-spoken of, we have too little love. We need a new inspiration—a divine endowment. "If these things be in you, and abound, they shall make you that ye be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

CHRISTIAN CONSISTENCY.

In a certain village in Wisconsin there is a church of professed Christians that will compare favorably with the average of our Protestant congregations. The pastor, a most amiable man, has much culture and fine abilities. In private, and on some occasions, he is strongly opposed to the entire secret lodge system, believing it to be practical heathenism. But not only does he never allude to it in public discourses, but steadfastly resists all reference to the subject in his house of worship.

His attitude before the world is that of entire neutrality. It is needless to say that no anti-secret lecturer can successfully apply for a hearing before this congregation. But the real animus of the position taken by this pastor and his people is seen in the fact that when it was desired to use this house of worship for a Masonic funeral, no objection was interposed. The pastor preached the discourse on that occasion, and the Masonic rites were performed by a minister who wore his little apron and Masonic jewelry. All passed off serenely. There was no sense of impropriety or incongruity.

Doubtless, this solemn occasion did much to promote the common idea, that the Masonic religion is quite sufficient to live by, and to die by. The pastor may be no more inclined to think so than before; but if he shall see his congregation reduced to a few women, and the doctrines which he has for years been teaching steadily undermined, and all real piety dying out in that community, he may be sorry that he had not the courage to preach what he believed.

SABBATH DESECRATION AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

An intelligent correspondent, living in Washington, in a letter to us last week, makes the following statement, which is worthy of serious consideration: "Secretary Foster" (of the Treasury Department) "is now considering a peculiar question, to-wit: Is the World's Fair open on Sundays? The question was raised by Mr. Thomas K. Cree, of New York City, who has written to Secretary Foster protesting against issuing the souvenir coins to the Columbian Exposition, because the managers thereof are violating the law by keeping the Exposition open on Sundays. He cites the legal opening of the Exposition in October last, and says that since that time the Exposition authorities have opened the grounds on Sundays and charged an admission fee to visitors, which, he claims, is a direct violation of law, the $2,500,000 in souvenir coins having been appropriated with a proviso that the Exposition should be closed on Sundays.

"The whole Sunday opening question is to be gone over again in Congress, and the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House has designated January 10, 11, 12 and 13 next as days upon which arguments on both sides of the question will be heard. It is claimed that a majority of the members of the House have pledged themselves to vote to amend the law so as to allow Sunday opening of the Exposition, provided that no machinery be run and that proper arrangements be made for regular religious services on the grounds. This claim may be correct, but I very much doubt it."

The secular press and all the Sabbath-breaking elements in the Union are working with an energy little less than Satanic in its malevolence, to force open the gates of the Exposition on Sunday.

It is now proposed to send an immense lobby to Washington to persuade Congress to repeal its action of last session and throw open the Exposition seven days in the week. One can imagine the character of the individuals of which such a lobby would be composed; the reckless misrepresentation, the wine-suppers, and all the unhallowed influences which such a gathering would resort to in pursuance of this diabolical work, and the tremendous consequences that might ensue if it proved successful.

The Almighty puts every nation on earth through at least one test proportionate to its character and political importance; and in every case when any nation has fallen under that test, disaster or extinction has overtaken it, unless, like Nineveh, it has repented and besought to the Lord to stay his vengeance.

The United States is now undergoing a crucial test. The Sunday question involves more than the World's Fair in its success or failure. It means a further prolongation of God's mercy upon us as a nation for our many social and political sins, or an occasion for increased anger against us for the willful desecration of his Sabbaths. The history of the past, of Israel, of Assyria, of many kingdoms, is full of warning for us. Will we heed it?

—Rev. W. Fenton is at the Wisconsin State Anti-secrecy convention, and will be heard from in its proceedings.

—Rev. H. H. Hinman writes from Waupaca, Wis.: "I am quite miserable—have to suspend all work." All Cynosure readers will regret this announcement, and let their sympathy find vent in prayers for our brother's restoration to health.

—We are prepared to send to new subscribers, for $2, in advance, the Cynosure for one year, and a copy of Rev. Dr. Carradine's excellent book—"A Journey to Palestine"—which sells for $1.50, both postage free. This is one of the best offers that we have yet made.

—In connection with our own anti-secrecy literature, we will send any miscellaneous or gift-book to our readers (the money to be sent with the order) at 20 per cent. (one-fifth) less than the regular prices of such publications. This offer will remain open all this month of December, and will afford an excellent opportunity to obtain holiday books at a very reasonable rate.

—As is usual when a multi-millionaire is called away, the estate of Jay Gould shrinks in value from the estimated $100,000,000 to about three-fourths of that amount. It goes, almost in its entirety, to his nearest relations, and his will is singularly oblivious of the needs of the great reforms and beneficent enterprises which his money would greatly promote and strengthen. The record of his virtues is summed up in three words—"He died rich."

—Field Secretary W. I. Phillips returned safely last week from his visit to the East, feeling very greatly encouraged to find the anti-secrecy work in that section receiving the hearty sanction of the many influential persons with whom it was his pleasure to meet in Boston and elsewhere. He regrets that business engagements of a pressing character compelled him to forego the kind invitations extended to him by Bros. Pratt, Knight and others, to prolong his stay and enjoy their hospitality. Their cordiality and courtesy is heartily appreciated.

—Philip D. Armour, Chicago's multi-millionaire beef-packer, has given a five-story building and the munificent sum of $1,400,000 for the creation and support of a local manual training school. Mr. Armour is also the founder of a very prosperous Episcopalian mission in this city. Practical in his character and pursuits, he believes not only in well-trained intellects but in proper physical culture. Contrasts drawn between his munificence and the lack of it in the late Jay Gould have not been flattering to the latter. The new school will be known as the Armour Institute.

—The good effect produced upon the public mind by the recent State Anti-secrecy Convention in Minnesota has been materially enhanced by the thoughtfulness and industry of Rev. L. G. Almen, who sent reports of its proceedings, for publication, to one Swedish and three English newspapers, in various parts of the State. The peculiarity of our reform work is the opposition which it receives from lodgemen, the indifference with which it is regarded by the masses, and the ignorance respecting the evils of lodgery that exists among those who would not support the secret orders if they understood them more thoroughly. With all these different difficulties to encounter, the N. C. A. feels that its friends everywhere can aid it no more effectually than by making public its objects and the work in which it is engaged. It only needs to be understood among true Christians to be rightly appreciated and its field enlarged. Will our numerous friends in every place exert themselves to increase the circulation of the Cynosure and the distribution of our anti-secrecy publications?

—Elder William Plant, of New Lisbon, Wis., referring to what Miss E. E. Flagg said about rocking-chairs in her New England Letter, printed in the Cynosure for December 1, writes as follows: "I write to correct what Miss Flagg says about there being no rocking-chairs in England. There were rocking-chairs in almost every house where I lived in England, sixty years ago. My grandmother had one or two in her house. I have been in different places in England and always found rocking-chairs in the house. I think there must have been rocking-chairs in England two hundred years ago." The genesis of the rocking-chair would make an interesting chapter.

—Henry Clews, the well-known Wall-street broker, predicts that the passage of the Anti-option bill by Congress (restraining gambling in grain) will cause great financial disaster. At present, he says, "The dealings in options in grain are virtually suspended, pending the fate of the bill. Buyers are dictating their own prices, which will become universal if dealings in options, which heretofore have made and sustained the markets, are prohibited by National law. The effect will necessarily be to bankrupt the bonanza farmers who produce the bulk of our wheat crop." As an indication of this result, he states that No. 3 wheat, in consequence, has fallen in Chicago to 65 cents per bushel, with few buyers. Temporarily Mr. Clews may be right, but the removal of gambling methods from all markets is a Christian duty. As matters now stand, the prices of grain are no longer governed by the natural law of supply and demand, but by the will of speculators, against whom the farmers are defenceless.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21, 1892.

Congress will take a recess from to-morrow until Jan. 4. The attendance this week has been small, and only such measures as were not opposed were taken up. A number of bills were passed, but about the only one of national interest was that passed by the House increasing the pensions of veterans of the Mexican war from $8 to $12 a month.

A very noticeable effect of the alley missions, which have been such a marked feature of Washington church work during the year now drawing to a close, is seen in the increased number of people who are interesting themselves in the conditions of the poor of our city; and I do not think it an exaggeration to say that the temporal needs of the poverty-stricken will be better looked after in this holiday season than ever before upon a similar occasion; and by looking after their temporal needs the way is opened for also supplying their spiritual needs, which are often the greatest.

Dr. Arthur MacDonald, a specialist of the U. S. Bureau of Education, having charge of educational data relating to the abnormal and weakling classes, delivered a lecture at the residence of Miss Clara Barton, this week, on "Education and its Effects on Crime," which is attracting much attention from the thoughtful. He contends that the work of reformation among the criminal classes does not begin early enough; and that although reform schools and similar institutions do much to keep the increase of crime within bounds, it is useless to expect any great decrease in crime, especially habitual crimes, until young children are properly cared for; that is, until they receive the moral and social education of a home or home-like institution, which, he thinks, is the foundation of all prevention of crime. He called attention to one of the principal facts brought out at the recent National Prison Congress, held at Baltimore—that all prisons should be reformatories; that all men, no matter how old in crime, can at least be benefited. And he argued, in conclusion, that the best prisons of the future will be reformatory prisons, and that the main features of reform will be the inculcation of good mental, moral, physical and industrial habits; in a word, education.

Mr. Blaine has been very near to death during the past week, and at this writing he still lies in a critical condition; the idea seems generally to have been accepted, outside of his family, the members of which still look forward hopefully to his recovery, that the termination will be fatal. His physicians say that he is suffering from a disease, but decline to say what disease it is, because his family have requested them not to tell.

Mistakes through ignorance are aggravating, both to the writer and intelligent reader, but doubly so is a mistake made through inadvertence. One of the last I made last week, when I wrote that Mr. Blaine was raised a Presbyterian and was now a communicant of that church, when I knew Mr. Blaine was raised a Congregationalist and had been for more than thirty years a member of a church of that denomination at Augusta, Maine. In Washington Mr. Blaine is a pew-holder and a regular attendant at the same Presbyterian church at which the President and his family attends, and it was probably because I knew that, that I wrote the word "Presbyterian" when "Congregational" was intended.

Secretary Foster is very positive in stating that there is no danger of a financial panic resulting from the continued large shipments of gold to Europe. He says that the Treasury gold reserve fund is now $24,500,000 in excess of the legal requirements; and that notwithstanding the recent unusually heavy demands upon the Treasury for gold, he has succeeded in getting in almost as much gold as he has paid out, and believes that he can continue to do so.

the Apostle Paul. We see pagan Rome, a paganized Romish church, and, chiefly by means of the lodges, paganized Protestant churches; so many of the pastors holding the Bible subject to lodge interpretation, which is in harmony with sun-worship.

I was aided by the Lutheran pastor, Bro. Sween, in getting the town hall, at a nominal rent, to cover the janitor's fees. All three of the Lutheran pastors were occupied with their respective churches at other places.

The main cause of the degradation of the churches to the level of lodge, sun or devil-worship may be found in the unsound and practically atheistic preaching of such a multitude of pastors. Such preaching as that of Jonathan Edwards would soon drive the lodge devil-worshippers out of the churches to where they belong. While pastors are, like Canon Farrar and others, extinguishing the lights in the light-houses that God has placed along the shores of time to warn us of coming wrath, and denying the existence of hell and the devil, lodge men will find the churches as profitable for some of their worldly ends as they do the lodges. It may be said, notwithstanding the attitude of the Odd-fellow pastor, that the hall at Benson was filled, and nearly all the Odd-fellows and Masons of the town were there.

ANTI-SECRECY WORK IN PENNSYLVANIA.

WILKINSBURG, Pa., Dec. 20, 1892.

The committee appointed by the Christian Association of Pennsylvania, opposed to secret societies, to take charge of the work in this State, have secured the services of Rev. W. B. Stoddard as lecturer for a number of months. He has already begun work in the eastern part of the State.

It is our desire to hold a State Convention at the close of Mr. Stoddard's labor. Money will be needed to carry on the work. Those who subscribed during the Pittsburgh convention are requested to send in their contributions. Other friends of the cause are urged to contribute. May we not confidently appeal to all who love their country and the cause of Christ, with the assurance that they will "come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty"?

All contributions may be sent to Rev. R. C. Wylie, Treasurer, Wilkesburg, Pa.

THE HOME.

SNOW-FLAKES.

Through the chilly winter morning,
Through the gloomy veil of mist,
Came the snow-flakes thickly falling,
Hiding everything they kissed—
Every window-sill and doorstep,
And the stones beneath the feet,
Till a pall of perfect whiteness
Covered all the silent street.

Soon the feet of busy people,
Passing to their daily toil,
Trod the whiteness out and marred it
With the grimy stain of soil;
Till the trampled mass presented
But a sad and painful sight—
Painful in its wretched contrast
With the snow of yesternight.

In the chilly winter morning
Came a little soul one day,
Sweet as any mountain daisy
Growing in its bed of clay.
Fair the face that shone above it,
Lithe the limbs that made its prison;
It was fairer than the snow-flakes
Ere the morning sun had risen.

Soon the hastening feet of Passion
Trod the soul and beat it down;
And a sinful hand defiled it
In the markets of the town;
Till the face had lost its beauty
And the limbs grown worn and thin,
With the wretchedness that follows
In the deadly track of sin.

Sullied snow is never whitened,
Never can be fair again;
But there is a purifying
For the sinful souls of men:
And the print of evil footsteps
In the downward path we trod,
May be blotted out forever,
By the mercy of our God.

JEANIE'S BIG BIBLE.

When one has a treasure, he prizes it and takes care of it that no harm may come to it. So those who love the Bible cherish it and consult its truths daily. They could not live a day without the Bible. In former times, before there were as many Bibles printed as there are now, they used to chain the Bible to the pulpits, and the church was kept open every day in the week so that poor people could go in and read the Word themselves or have it read to them. Would not that seem strange to you?

Bibles used to be very costly, so that poor people could not afford to have one. So in those times you would find them only in churches and in the houses of kings and rich men. They were great, heavy volumes, worth almost their weight in gold. Some of these old-fashioned Bibles are in existence still in churches of rural England, and people go a long way to see them on account of their value as relics. You can imagine how they were guarded and how they were taken care of, for Bibles could not be bought every day, even by kings and queens. But who would think of injuring the Bible?

There is a story told, which doubtless you have heard, of the little English prince who, when his companions took the big Bible to use as a footstool, rushed forward and seized the precious volume, exclaiming, "Not that! not that! The Word of God is not to be treated like a block of wood. You must not hurt my Bible." And he kissed the book lovingly, and replaced it upon the table. It is a pretty story, and we are led to think all the better of the thoughtful and pious young Tudor prince who is known in history as Edward VI.

There is another story told, however, that I like even better than this, and I do not think you are familiar with it. It is not about a prince, but of a poor Scotch girl who risked her life to save her precious Bible. Her name was Jeanie, and she lived far back during the days of the bloody persecutions under the reckless Charles II. It was a bitter time, you may be sure. No one was safe if he was suspected of reading the Bible or worshiping God in a different way from the established religion. Soldiers were marching all over the country, driving people from their homes, burning their houses, and putting many innocent persons to death. Jeanie's parents were pious people, and their turn came at last to be driven from their home.

One afternoon the cruel soldiers were seen advancing and the poor folks had to leave their cottage and flee with what valuables they could carry. Jeanie was given the big family Bible for her load, and her father told her that she must be very careful with it, and not have it get hurt, nor lose it by the way. "For we could not live," said he, "without the good Book." She wrapped one of her clean gowns around the book, and started with it in her hands, following her father and mother, each of whom carried a child. The fugitives directed their steps toward the next village, where there was a strong old church that could be used as a fort, and which they hoped to reach before their enemies came up. A stream lay in the way, and this they dared not cross by the bridge for fear of their pursuers. So they hastened to a place in the river where some stepping-stones had been laid for the convenience of foot passengers. It was quite dark when they reached the bank, and the water ran swiftly in its channel. But they did not hesitate. The father waded across, carrying the others, one by one, in his arms, until Jeanie was left alone. Fearing solitude more than the dangers of the stream, the young girl followed her father on his last trip, stepping carefully from stone to stone. But it was so dark now that she could scarcely see the way before her, and presently her foot slipped, and she went down to the bottom.

In her danger she did not forget, however, the treasure entrusted to her care. As her feet went down her arms went up, and her precious burden was held above her head. She struggled bravely against the current, and though the water came up to her waist, she managed to keep on toward the shore, holding the dear old Bible as high as she could raise it. Her father met her before she gained the bank, and clasped both his treasures in his strong arms.

"Father," said the brave little maid, "you told me to take care of the dear old Bible, and I have done so."

Several pistol shots were heard at that moment, and the sound approaching horsemen. The fugitives found concealment in a cleft among the rocks, and fortunately were not discovered. After their pursuers had rode away, they issued from their retreat, and soon after reached the church in safety.

In after years Jeanie married, and lived happily with her husband to a good old age. The great Bible became hers after her father's death, and in it were recorded the names of her seven children. It is still in possession of her descendants, in a well-preserved condition.

Jeanie never forgot that night of peril when she carried the old Bible through the deep waters. When she was dying she dreamed of her girlish exploit, and cried out, "I'm in the deep river—in the deep waters, but I will hold up the dear old Bible. There, father, take the book!"

With these words she ceased to breathe. —Sel.

TRUTHFULNESS.

Two country lads came at an early hour to a market town, and, arranging their little stands, sat down to wait for customers. One was furnished with fruits and vegetables of the boy's own raising, and the other supplied with clams and fish. The market hours passed along, and each little merchant saw with pleasure his store steadily decreasing, and an equivalent in silver bits shining in his little money-cup. The last melon lay on Harry's stand, when a gentleman came by, and placing his hand upon it, said: "What a fine, large melon! What do you ask for it, my boy?"

"The melon is the last I have, sir; and though it looks very fair, there is an unsound spot in it," said the boy, turning it over.

"So there is," said the man; "I think I will not take it. But" he added, looking into the boy's fine, open countenance, "is it very business-like to point out the defects of your fruit to your customers?"

"It is better than being dishonest, sir," said the boy modestly.

"You are right, little fellow; always remember that principle, and you will find favor with God, and man also. I shall remember your little stand in future. Are those clams fresh?" he continued, turning to Ben Wilson's stand.

"Yes, sir, fresh this morning. I caught them myself," was the reply; and a purchase being made, the gentleman went away.

"Harry, what a fool you were to show the gentleman that spot in the melon! Now you can take it home for your pains, or throw it away. How much wiser is he about those clams I caught yesterday? Sold them for the same price as I did the fresh ones. He would never have looked at the melon until he had gone away."

"Ben, I would not tell a lie, or act one either, for twice what I have earned this morning. Besides, I shall be better off in the end; for I have gained a customer, and you have lost one."

And so it proved; for the next day the gentleman bought nearly all his fruit and vegetables of Harry, but never spent another penny at the stand of his neighbor. Thus the season passed. The gentleman, finding he could always get a good article of Harry, constantly patronized him, and sometimes talked with him a few minutes about his future prospects. To become a merchant was Harry's great ambition; and when the winter came on, the gentleman, wanting a trusty boy for his warehouse, decided on giving the place to Harry. Steadily and surely he advanced in the confidence of his employer, until, having passed through various posts of service, he became at length an honored partner in the firm.

THE HOME.

"To guard the sanctities of home is the highest duty of the state. To reconsecrate those natural sanctities by the blessing of holy prayer and solemn rite, and throw over the home the shield of God's law in its power, is the plain duty of the church. But the home so shielded must be a Christian home. It must hold living communion with the high-walled home of our Father's house above. We solemnly charge our brethren to look well to this. We fear, above all, the decay of family piety. Dear brethren, it is idle to look for a living church where families enter on the day without a prayer, sit down to meat unblest by any lifted thought of thanks, and retire to a rest which has no remembrance of God, and asks no care from the sleepless eye and the overshadowing hand. It is homes of another sort which, in the long story of our people's life, have trained and sent forth the men who have helped and saved their brethren in their need." —Episcopalian Pastoral Letter.

A LESSON IN GIVING.

A Methodist minister says that in one of his charges a good man regularly gave, every Sabbath, five dollars for the support of the church. A poor widow was also a member of the same church, who supported herself and six children by washing. She was as regular as the rich man in making her offering of five cents per week, which was all she could spare from her scant earnings. One day the rich man came to the minister and said that the poor woman ought not to pay anything, and that he would pay the five cents for her every week. The pastor called to tell her of the offer, which he did in a considerate manner. Tears came to the woman's eyes as she replied: "Do they want to take from me the comfort I experience in giving to the Lord? Think how much I owe to him! My health is good, my children keep well, and I receive so many blessings that I feel I could not live if I did not make my little offering to Jesus each week." How many young men there are who know nothing of the privilege of regularly giving something to the Lord's work, because they have never tried it! —The Treasury.

A HERO.

A few years ago the traveler through Switzerland might have seen a charming little village, now, alas! no longer in existence. A fire broke out one day, and in a few hours the quaint little frame houses were entirely destroyed. The poor peasants ran around wringing their hands and weeping over their lost homes and the bones of the burned cattle.

One poor man was in greater trouble than his neighbors, even. True, his home and cows were gone, but so also was his son, a bright boy of six or seven years. He wept and refused to hear any words of comfort. He spent the night wandering sorrowfully among the ruins, while his acquaintances had taken refuge in the neighboring villages.

Just as daylight came, however, he heard a well-known sound, and looking up he saw his favorite cow leading the herd, and coming directly after them was his bright-eyed little boy.

"Oh, my son! my son!" he cried, "are you really alive?"

"Why, yes, father. When I saw the fire, I ran to get our cows away, to the pasture lands."

"You are a hero, my boy!" the father exclaimed.

But the boy said: "Oh, no! A hero is one who does some wonderful deed. I led the cows away because they were in danger, and I knew it was the right thing to do."

"Ah!" cried the father, "he who does the right thing at the right time is a hero."—Selected.

THE TEST.

The principal of a school in which boys were prepared for college one day received a message from a lawyer living in the same town, requesting him to call at his office, as he wished to have a talk with him.

Arrived at the office, the lawyer stated that he had in his gift a scholarship entitling a boy to a four years' course in a certain college, and that he wished to bestow it where it would be best used.

"Therefore," he continued, "I have concluded to let you decide which boy of your school most deserves it."

"That is a hard question to decide," replied the teacher, thoughtfully. "Two of my pupils—Charles Hart and Henry Strong—will complete the course of study in my school this year. Both desire a collegiate education, and neither is able to obtain it without assistance. They are so nearly equal that I cannot tell which is the better scholar."

"How is it as to deportment?" asked the lawyer.

"One boy does not more scrupulously observe all the rules of the school than the other," was the answer.

"Well," said the lawyer, "if at the end of the year one boy has gone ahead of the other, send them to me and I will decide between them."

As before, at the closing examinations the boys stood equal in attainments. They were directed to call at the lawyer's office, no information being given as to the object of the visit.

Two intelligent, well-bred boys they seemed, and the lawyer was beginning to wonder greatly how he should make a decision between them. Just then the door opened, and an elderly lady of peculiar appearance entered. She was well known as being of unsettled mind, and possessed of the idea that she had been deprived of a large fortune when justly hers. As a consequence she was in the habit of visiting lawyers' offices, carrying in her hands a package of papers which she wished examined. She was a familiar visitor to this office, where she was always received with respect and dismissed with kindly promises of help.

This morning, seeing that the lawyer was already occupied with others, she seated herself to wait his leisure. Unfortunately, the chair she selected was broken and had to be set aside as useless.

The result was that she fell in a rather awkward manner, scattering her papers about the floor. The lawyer looked with a quick eye at the boys, before moving himself, to see what they would do.

Charles Hart, after an amused survey of the fall, turned aside to hide a laugh he could not control.

Henry Strong sprang to the woman's side and lifted her to her feet. Then carefully gathering up her papers, he politely handed them to her. Her profuse and rambling thanks served only to increase Charles' amusement.

After the lady had told her customary story, to which the lawyer listened with every appearance of attention, he escorted her to the door and she departed.

Then he turned to the boys, and after expressing pleasure at having formed their acquaintance, he dismissed them. The next day the teacher was informed of the occurrence and told that the scholarship would be given to Henry Strong, with the remark: "No one so well deserves to be fitted for a position of honor and influence as he who feels it his duty to help the humblest and the lowliest."—M. E. Saffold, in the Christian Union.

POINTS FOR PROHIBITION PAPERS.

Southern Star: A good many people who are anxious to keep politics out of the pulpit, are equally desirous to keep them in the gutter, where they can more easily manage the machine.

Dayton (Ohio) Liberator: Prohibitionists who voted for Harrison are probably the most unhappy men, politically, that can be found. They threw away both their votes and their principles.

Griffin's (Catholic) Journal: If the drunkard goes to hell, where goes the Christian voter that licensed the saloon?

The People: We are repeating history. The People's party is the old Know-nothing party over again, and the prohibitionists are doing the work of the Abolitionists—laying the foundation of a party that is going to win.

Ibid: Four years more of rum-selling. Four hundred thousand new boys must be supplied to fill the places in the drunkards' procession of those who will stagger into drunkards' graves and the drunkard's hell.

Montana New Issue: What a pitiable object is the man who has never engaged in any contest in life. This life is a battle-field, and he who has not engaged in some conflict has certainly been shirking a duty. The brave soldier finds his place at the front.

Des Moines (Iowa) Daily News: George W. Dales, of Wabash, Ind., bought liquor in a licensed saloon which made him so drunk that he traded horses with Charles Farr without knowing it, and when he sobered up he forgot all about it and had Farr arrested for stealing his horse.

Now Farr has brought suit for $5,000 damages. What a promoter of peace, sobriety and good will a "well-regulated" saloon is!

Dayton (Ohio) Liberator: There is a feeling in the air that party lines and divisions of the past are forever broken, and that the reform elements of the country will have become united and solidified by the time of the next Presidential election.

Groton Review: The saloon is the most potent factor in the great drama of human misery this nation has to contend with, and it should be outlawed. Then Thanksgiving day would mean something. With the saloons running full blast this great New England holiday might as well be abolished.

Baltimore Issue: Is a "licensed" saloon less dangerous to your boy than an unlicensed rum-hole? And is it as easily suppressed? Will not the "license" protect it in its nefarious work of destroying your boy? And will you vote for the party whose temperance principle is "license?"

Prohibition Advocate: A good motto for a good citizen: I am only one, but I am one. I cannot do everything, but I can do something. What I can do, I ought to do, and by the grace of God I will do. I will vote the Prohibition ticket hereafter to down the murderous liquor traffic.

Sherman (N. Y.) Advance: The prohibition campaign of 1896 began at the closing of the polls Tuesday, Nov. 8. The Prohibition party does not propose to go into winter quarters, or even stack its guns, but to press the fight until the best voters of the old parties are compelled to accept its position: "Self-protection and the protection of the home." So we say, on with the fight!

Independent Citizen: The lack of interest in politics shows that the people have discovered that it makes no difference which of the old parties win.

Bloomington (Ill.) Lancet: Wendell Phillips coined a great truth when he uttered this language: "The man who for party forsakes principle goes down, and all the armed battalions of God march over him."

Scranton (Pa.) People: It is a pretty difficult matter for any one to "keep sweet" when we see the professed Christians of the land denouncing the saloon with their mouths and sustaining the traffic with their ballots.

Florida Philosopher: There was a chance for reform and getting rid of the corrupt practices in politics by the election of Bidwell. But the people have gone right on in the old rut, and indorsed the villainy of the two dominant parties. There are probably dangers ahead, and whatever evils arise politically the next four years the people will only have themselves to blame for not exercising the elective franchise intelligently.

Church Union: While we permit the manufacture of distilled liquors we must submit to the traffic in the same, and prepare as best we can for the degradation and devastation as the result of what our government is pleased to term a national industry. We might as well commence to level the forest by clipping at the leaves and twigs of the trees in making ready for the grain fields, as to spend our time and substance in battling against the methods of the sale of alcoholic stimulants. We must go to the root of the matter and devote our time and means to abolishing the manufacture of distilled liquors, except for medicinal and manufacturing purposes. When we succeed in ridding the country of all alcoholic stimulants, as a beverage, nine-tenths of the criminals of our cities will become valuable producing citizens.

Southern Journal: Prohibitionists, there is no royal road to success, but success is assured if you stand by your guns and claim what is just and right.

What is it to vote with the Republican party? There are at least 60,000 people in this city; in other words, one in one thousand of the people of the United States live in Los Angeles. Then we have 600 drunkards here, and sixty deaths by reason of drink every year. One hundred and twenty will go to their death sacrificed on the altar of rum by Christian votes, during the coming administration, just for fifty dollars per month license, so that their taxes may be reduced.—California Voice.

THE HOME.

SNOW-FLAKES.

Through the chilly winter morning,
Through the gloomy veil of mist,
Came the snow-flakes thickly falling,
Hiding everything they kissed—
Every window-sill and doorstep,
And the stones beneath the feet,
Till a pall of perfect whiteness
Covered all the silent street.

Soon the feet of busy people,
Passing to their daily toil,
Trod the whiteness out and marred it
With the grimy stain of soil;
Till the trampled mass presented
But a sad and painful sight—
Painful in its wretched contrast
With the snow of yesternight.

In the chilly winter morning
Came a little soul one day,
Sweet as any mountain daisy
Growing in its bed of clay.
Fair the face that shone above it,
Lithe the limbs that made its prison;
It was fairer than the snow-flakes
Ere the morning sun had risen.

Soon the hastening feet of Passion
Trod the soul and beat it down;
And a sinful hand defiled it
In the markets of the town;
Till the face had lost its beauty
And the limbs grown worn and thin,
With the wretchedness that follows
In the deadly track of sin.

Sullied snow is never whitened,
Never can be fair again;
But there is a purifying
For the sinful souls of men:
And the print of evil footsteps
In the downward path we trod,
May be blotted out forever,
By the mercy of our God.

JEANIE'S BIG BIBLE.

When one has a treasure, he prizes it and takes care of it that no harm may come to it. So those who love the Bible cherish it and consult its truths daily. They could not live a day without the Bible. In former times, before there were as many Bibles printed as there are now, they used to chain the Bible to the pulpits, and the church was kept open every day in the week so that poor people could go in and read the Word themselves or have it read to them. Would not that seem strange to you?

Bibles used to be very costly, so that poor people could not afford to have one. So in those times you would find them only in churches and in the houses of kings and rich men. They were great, heavy volumes, worth almost their weight in gold. Some of these old-fashioned Bibles are in existence still in churches of rural England, and people go a long way to see them on account of their value as relics. You can imagine how they were guarded and how they were taken care of, for Bibles could not be bought every day, even by kings and queens. But who would think of injuring the Bible?

There is a story told, which doubtless you have heard, of the little English prince who, when his companions took the big Bible to use as a footstool, rushed forward and seized the precious volume, exclaiming, "Not that! not that! The Word of God is not to be treated like a block of wood. You must not hurt my Bible." And he kissed the book lovingly, and replaced it upon the table. It is a pretty story, and we are led to think all the better of the thoughtful and pious young Tudor prince who is known in history as Edward VI.

There is another story told, however, that I like even better than this, and I do not think you are familiar with it. It is not about a prince, but of a poor Scotch girl who risked her life to save her precious Bible. Her name was Jeanie, and she lived far back during the days of the bloody persecutions under the reckless Charles II. It was a bitter time, you may be sure. No one was safe if he was suspected of reading the Bible or worshipping God in a different way from the established religion. Soldiers were marching all over the country, driving people from their homes, burning their houses, and putting many innocent persons to death. Jeanie's parents were pious people, and their turn came at last to be driven from their home.

One afternoon the cruel soldiers were seen advancing and the poor folks had to leave their cottage and flee with what valuables they could carry. Jeanie was given the big family Bible for her load, and her father told her that she must be very careful with it, and not have it get hurt, nor lose it by the way. "For we could not live," said he, "without the good Book." She wrapped one of her clean gowns around the book, and started with it in her hands, following her father and mother, each of whom carried a child. The fugitives directed their steps toward the next village, where there was a strong old church that could be used as a fort, and which they hoped to reach before their enemies came up. A stream lay in the way, and this they dared not cross by the bridge for fear of their pursuers. So they hastened to a place in the river where some stepping-stones had been laid for the convenience of foot passengers. It was quite dark when they reached the bank, and the water ran swiftly in its channel. But they did not hesitate. The father waded across, carrying the others, one by one, in his arms, until Jeanie was left alone. Fearing solitude more than the dangers of the stream, the young girl followed her father on his last trip, stepping carefully from stone to stone. But it was so dark now that she could scarcely see the way before her, and presently her foot slipped, and she went down to the bottom.

In her danger she did not forget, however, the treasure entrusted to her care. As her feet went down her arms went up, and her precious burden was held above her head. She struggled bravely against the current, and though the water came up to her waist, she managed to keep on toward the shore, holding the dear old Bible as high as she could raise it. Her father met her before she gained the bank, and clasped both his treasures in his strong arms.

"Father," said the brave little maid, "you told me to take care of the dear old Bible, and I have done so."

Several pistol shots were heard at that moment, and the sound approaching horsemen. The fugitives found concealment in a cleft among the rocks, and fortunately were not discovered. After their pursuers had rode away, they issued from their retreat, and soon after reached the church in safety.

In after years Jeanie married, and lived happily with her husband to a good old age. The great Bible became hers after her father's death, and in it were recorded the names of her seven children. It is still in possession of her descendants, in a well-preserved condition.

Jeanie never forgot that night of peril when she carried the old Bible through the deep waters. When she was dying she dreamed of her girlish exploit, and cried out, "I'm in the deep river—in the deep waters, but I will hold up the dear old Bible. There, father, take the book!"

With these words she ceased to breathe. —Sel.

TRUTHFULNESS.

Two country lads came at an early hour to a market town, and, arranging their little stands, sat down to wait for customers. One was furnished with fruits and vegetables of the boy's own raising, and the other supplied with clams and fish. The market hours passed along, and each little merchant saw with pleasure his store steadily decreasing, and an equivalent in silver bits shining in his little money-cup. The last melon lay on Harry's stand, when a gentleman came by, and placing his hand upon it, said: "What a fine, large melon! What do you ask for it, my boy?"

"The melon is the last I have, sir; and though it looks very fair, there is an unsound spot in it," said the boy, turning it over.

"So there is," said the man; "I think I will not take it. But" he added, looking into the boy's fine, open countenance, "is it very business-like to point out the defects of your fruit to your customers?"

"It is better than being dishonest, sir," said the boy modestly.

"You are right, little fellow; always remember that principle, and you will find favor with God, and man also. I shall remember your little stand in future. Are those clams fresh?" he continued, turning to Ben Wilson's stand.

"Yes, sir, fresh this morning. I caught them myself," was the reply; and a purchase being made, the gentleman went away.

"Harry, what a fool you were to show the gentleman that spot in the melon! Now you can take it home for your pains, or throw it away. How much wiser is he about those clams I caught yesterday? Des Moines (Iowa) Daily News: George W. Dales, of Wabash, Ind., bought liquor in a licensed saloon which made him so drunk that he traded horses with Charles Farr without knowing it, and when he sobered up he forgot all about it and had Farr arrested for stealing his horse.

Now Farr has brought suit for $5,000 damages. What a promoter of peace, sobriety and good will a "well-regulated" saloon is!

Dayton (Ohio) Liberator: There is a feeling in the air that party lines and divisions of the past are forever broken, and that the reform elements of the country will have become united and solidified by the time of the next Presidential election.

Groton Review: The saloon is the most potent factor in the great drama of human misery this nation has to contend with, and it should be outlawed. Then Thanksgiving day would mean something. With the saloons running full blast this great New England holiday might as well be abolished.

Baltimore Issue: Is a "licensed" saloon less dangerous to your boy than an unlicensed rum-hole? And is it as easily suppressed? Will not the "license" protect it in its nefarious work of destroying your boy? And will you vote for the party whose temperance principle is "license?"

Prohibition Advocate: A good motto for a good citizen: I am only one, but I am one. I cannot do everything, but I can do something. What I can do, I ought to do, and by the grace of God I will do. I will vote the Prohibition ticket hereafter to down the murderous liquor traffic.

Sherman (N. Y.) Advance: The prohibition campaign of 1896 began at the closing of the polls Tuesday, Nov. 8. The Prohibition party does not propose to go into winter quarters, or even stack its guns, but to press the fight until the best voters of the old parties are compelled to accept its position: "Self-protection and the protection of the home." So we say, on with the fight!

Independent Citizen: The lack of interest in politics shows that the people have discovered that it makes no difference which of the old parties win.

Bloomington (Ill.) Lancet: Wendell Phillips coined a great truth when he uttered this language: "The man who for party forsakes principle goes down, and all the armed battalions of God march over him."

Scranton (Pa.) People: It is a pretty difficult matter for any one to "keep sweet" when we see the professed Christians of the land denouncing the saloon with their mouths and sustaining the traffic with their ballots.

Florida Philosopher: There was a chance for reform and getting rid of the corrupt practices in politics by the election of Bidwell. But the people have gone right on in the old rut, and indorsed the villainy of the two dominant parties. There are probably dangers ahead, and whatever evils arise politically the next four years the people will only have themselves to blame for not exercising the elective franchise intelligently.

Church Union: While we permit the manufacture of distilled liquors we must submit to the traffic in the same, and prepare as best we can for the degradation and devastation as the result of what our government is pleased to term a national industry. We might as well commence to level the forest by clipping at the leaves and twigs of the trees in making ready for the grain fields, as to spend our time and substance in battling against the methods of the sale of alcoholic stimulants. We must go to the root of the matter and devote our time and means to abolishing the manufacture of distilled liquors, except for medicinal and manufacturing purposes. When we succeed in ridding the country of all alcoholic stimulants, as a beverage, nine-tenths of the criminals of our cities will become valuable producing citizens.

Southern Journal: Prohibitionists, there is no royal road to success, but success is assured if you stand by your guns and claim what is just and right.

What is it to vote with the Republican party? There are at least 60,000 people in this city; in other words, one in one thousand of the people of the United States live in Los Angeles. Then we have 600 drunkards here, and sixty deaths by reason of drink every year. One hundred and twenty will go to their death sacrificed on the altar of rum by Christian votes, during the coming administration, just for fifty dollars per month license, so that their taxes may be reduced.—California Voice.

BIBLE LESSON.

STUDIES IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

LESSON II.—First Quarter, 1893.—January 8.

SUBJECT.—Rebuilding the Temple.—Ezra 3: 1-13.

GOLDEN TEXT.—They praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid.—Ezra 3: 11.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

DAILY READINGS.—M.—Ezra 3: 1-7. T.—Ezra 3: 8-13. W.—Lev. 23: 33-44. T.—2 Cor. 8: 1-9. F.—Psalm 118: 1-14. S.—Jer. 33: 7-16. S.—Rev. 7: 9-17.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The first work of the returned exiles.—vs. 1-3. The first thing the Pilgrim Fathers did when they landed in New England was to build a place for public worship, or, as it was called in olden times, a "meeting house". These Jewish exiles proceeded on the same principles. They took their first step towards rebuilding the temple by setting up again the fallen altar of burnt-offering. They set it upon its base—that is, on the old foundations. We have more light on the Scriptures than our fathers had; we see many truths which they did not see; and all this is well. Indeed, it would be very strange, and to our discredit, if we had made no progress since their day; but let us be sure and keep to the old foundations—the one underlying basis for all truth to rest upon, "Jesus Christ and him crucified". We notice that even the restoration of the temple was not, in their view, of such prime importance as the restoring of the national worship. So even church-building is not so important a thing as soul-building. Zion's waste places can only be repaired through such a revival of true spiritual religion as shall lead to the setting up of our fallen family altars. Is it strange that those who thus neglect the duty which lies nearest to them have usually little or nothing to contribute to either home or foreign evangelization? "For fear was upon them." They were surrounded by a population either openly or secretly hostile, and they felt the need of putting themselves at once under the divine protection. Individually we are all surrounded by spiritual foes, and a sense of our weakness should drive us daily nearer God.

2. Days of Thanksgiving.—vs. 4-6. The Feast of Tabernacles resembled, in many respects, our own Thanksgiving day. It was filled with joyous festivity and social reunions, in which God's blessings, national and individual, were gratefully remembered. During those long years of captivity and exile it must have become, in the minds of the younger Jews at least, only a dim, traditionary remembrance; and it was a wise step, politically, to keep again this ancient festival, for it cemented anew the social and religious ties which bound them together, and was indeed a first step towards the restoration of their nationality. We notice that it was not only an occasion for feasting and joy; but it was, first and foremost, a religious festival. "They offered the daily burnt-offerings by number," through the eight days in which it continued. Our old-fashioned Thanksgiving day has been largely secularized; in our prosperity we have grown unmindful of all it stands for—all we have to be thankful for as individuals, or as a nation. Shall we, like the Jews, have to pass through a season of national trouble before we learn to keep it according to its true significance? Jewish history, before the seventy years' captivity, was a constant succession of lapses into idolatry, and corresponding neglect of their sacred feast-days. But our lesson marks a new era. From this time they were an utterly changed people; for, though their religion became finally very dead and formal, their whole national life, until the final destruction of their city and temple by the Romans, was a constant and fierce stand for the worship of the one true God, as opposed to the prevailing polytheism of the nations around them.

3. The workmen paid.—v. 7. "They gave money also unto the masons and carpenters," etc. Two lessons are here suggested: (1) The joyful readiness with which they gave to the rebuilding of the temple a sum which amounted, in our money, to $400,000. They were "cheerful," or, in the literal Greek, "hilarious" givers. They did not resort to any questionable method of raising the money; but, if they had been like many Christian people to-day, they would have held a fair, and thus tried to coax a portion out of the world's people,—the half-heathen, half-Jewish population of the surrounding cities and towns. So far from this, they refused their proffered help (ch. 4: 1-3), just as every Christian church should refuse to take the money of wealthy distillers and brewers to carry on their religious work. (2) They did not run in debt. So far as the work proceeded on the temple, so far it was paid for. "Owe no man anything" is just as much a command to a body of Christian people organized into a church as it is to each one of them individually.

4. The foundation laid.—vs. 8-13. Amid the sound of trumpet and cymbal, and responsive chants of praise, the foundation was laid; but while some shouted for joy, others who had seen the former edifice in all its glory "wept with a loud voice,"—not for its lack of material splendor so much as for the missing ark of the covenant, the Shekinah glory, the Urim and Thummim, which no money could buy. And yet the presence of the Messiah was to make the new temple far more glorious than the old. Let us not regret the past, nor decry the present. God is keeping in store for us better things than we dream of. The golden age for the Christian lies ever before him.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTISTS.

—The Standard learns that "Gen. T. J. Morgan, whose service as Indian Commissioner under the present administration has not only afforded him opportunity for splendid service in an important department of national affairs, but has put him in relation with what may well be esteemed a work in home missions, has been elected secretary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, as successor to Dr. Morehouse. As another important feature in the new arrangements, Dr. Morehouse is to become field secretary."

—An important conference of Sunday-school missionaries of the American Baptist Publication Society has just been held in Chicago at the solicitation of Rev. J. W. Harris, the recently appointed district secretary, consisting of E. A. Russell, of Nebraska, E. B. Edmunds, of Wisconsin, D. P. Ward, S. D., E. D. Rundell, Michigan, C. S. Sheffield, Kansas, L. R. Albert, Illinois, G. W. Danbury, Illinois. The object of the conference was to secure greater uniformity in all branches of the work of the society.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—On Saturday, Dec. 17, Henry N. Holden died at his home, Chicago, after an illness of only four days. Mr. Holden was born in Providence, R. I., in 1835, came to Chicago with his father in 1856, and was until 1885 engaged in the lumber business, when he ceased from regular commercial duties. He became a member of the First Congregational church in 1875, and soon took an active part in the work of the church; indeed, he was a trustee and did much good work before uniting with the church. He was chairman of the board of trustees from 1877 till the time of his death, and far more than any other, bore the burden of the business of the church. He became a director in Chicago Theological Seminary in 1882, and was chairman of the executive committee from 1887 till the close of his life. He superintended the building of Fisk Hall, and, in a very important sense, it is his monument. The loss of no other man would be so felt in the First church and in the Seminary as the departure of Mr. Holden.

EVANGELISTIC.

—Of the recent revival meetings at Omaha, Neb., conducted by B. Fay Mills, the Midland (United Presbyterian) says: "At this time it is hard to say just what the result has been, but enough is known to pronounce the movement a success. Large numbers have professed their faith in Christ, and a desire to follow him. Christianity has been brought into prominence in the city as never before. About ninety per cent of the business houses and offices either closed their places of business, or permitted their clerks to attend the meetings on Wednesday of last week. Morning, afternoon and evening of that day Mr. Mills preached to audiences, limited only by the capacity of the building. It remains for the churches to prosecute the work vigorously."

—During the past summer, Mr. Moody has had two additional stories placed on the men's department of the Bible Institute, Chicago, and has thereby added seventy-five rooms for students. The building is completed and Mr. Moody has raised the money to pay for it, but owing to the enlargement of the work in Great Britain, and especially in Ireland, he has been detained there in order to follow up the remarkable work of grace begun, and therefore has not secured the money to furnish these additional rooms. The Christian public is appealed to for help to make the additional much-needed rooms available with suitable furniture. The expense for each room is about $75. Contributions are to be sent to F. G. Ensign, 143 La Salle street, Chicago.

—Mr. Moody declares that 100,000 souls should be saved in Chicago next year. He says he will bend every effort to the accomplishment of this end. He writes: "I shall have a tabernacle built somewhere along the lake easy of access. I shall solicit the assistance of the local clergy, who will probably establish missions in all quarters of the city. I am anxious for the fray."

—A proposition in England is now on hand to organize a grand evangelizing scheme to itinerate over England, consisting of four men and women, who shall volunteer for the work, staying about a week at each place, holding services.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The committee on arrangements for the International Epworth League conference to be held at Cleveland, Ohio, July 6 to 9, 1893, met at Cleveland, Dec. 14 and 15, to arrange a tentative program. Gov. McKinley of Ohio is expected to deliver the address of welcome. The first day will be given to the department of social life. The second day's program will include the department of literary work; the third day the works of mercy and help, and the fourth day (Sunday), the department of spiritual work. Under these departments will be grouped a series of addresses on modern methods along all the lines of religious work, which will have running through them as a general topic, "The church of tomorrow."

—The Methodists of Buffalo have organized for aggressive work, and recently raised $7,000 for city evangelization.

—There are 903 Methodist Episcopal church edifices in Michigan. About 100 school-houses or halls are used as preaching places, making 1,000 Methodist pulpits in the State.

—There is a growing conviction that a church as large as the Methodist Episcopal, with over $115,000,000 of church and parsonage property, besides its schools and book concerns amounting to several millions more, ought to do its own insurance.

—The Congregationalist says: "From the report of a recent meeting of Methodist ministers in New York it is evident that our sister denomination will soon be wrestling in theological conflicts similar to those which so much absorb the attention of Presbyterians."

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—There are hundreds of thousands of Catholic families who do not buy even one Catholic book a year.—New York Catholic Review.

SALVATION ARMY.

—Of the great congress of the Army, a few days ago, at the East, an exchange says: "We were in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night. The officers and soldiers from every part of the country were there in strong force. From lower floor to top gallery every part was thronged and crowds outside could not gain admission. We were seated so as to have a full view of the grand scene. We have no language to describe it. Hallelujahs, quickly-born, surged their way through our soul."

"The most attractive thing on the program was the dedication of the infant child of Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth (about two weeks old) to Christ and the Army service. The ceremony was very simple and yet very impressive."

"While the soldiers were singing softly, 'Lead me gently, Lead me lest I stray,' Mrs. Booth came upon the platform with the babe in her arms, and handed it to the father. Holding it in his arms, the Commander made a few appropriate remarks as to the reality of the sacrifice and their consciousness as parents of its deep significance, and, said he, 'I pray that, like Samuel, this child may early know the voice of God in her heart, and that she may learn to take her place in the great campaign of soul-saving in the world.' Then casting a benignant look upon the dear one quietly resting on his bosom, he said, 'Myrtle Theodora Booth, in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, in the presence of this vast crowd of onlookers, and of my dear wife, his handmaid, I dedicate you to the service of Jesus Christ, and in the name of the dear General and those assembled here, I receive the little soldier into the ranks of this movement.' Staff-Colonel Evans offered prayer. Mrs. Booth after taking the babe to its quiet resting-place, returned and made a beautiful address, which melted all hearts. While the ceremony of dedication was proceeding the flag of the United States and the flag of the Army were gracefully intertwined over the head of the little recruit."

UNITARIAN.

—There is a movement to change the Unitarian theology, which proposes to "develop the church idea as it has been developed in all the Christian centuries from the beginning, the using of a liturgy as the best way in which the common worship of devout people can be secured—a liturgy that recognizes the idea of sacrifice, the furnishing of a Christian basis for the deeper life of the people, the determination to push for recognition in the whole Christian church, as a true and legitimate part of it, the acceptance of the Bible, not only as literature, but as a revelation, the making the whole body less and less of a sect and more and more a movement with a purpose, the pushing of the point that not nature, but the Gospel, should be the substance of preaching, and that what is needed among the Unitarians as a body is the revival of the spiritual life."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

A dispatch from Muskegon, Mich., reports that Captain McBride, of the steamer City of New York, has been missing for several days. On leaving the boat he told the mate that he had with him $1,000, with which to pay some bills. It is feared that he was murdered for his money.

At Mt. Clemens, Mich., "Prof." E. Church, a "medium," gave a spirit-seance. During his performance in the dark J. E. Nellis, a local newspaper man, seized one of the spirits and held on until the light was struck. Church was then found to be arrayed in a sheet spread with phosphorus. The indignant spiritualists nearly mobbed the professor.

At Detroit, Mich., Lingi Pessino mysteriously lost $500 in bills. Diligent search failed to locate the money. Next morning Mrs. Pessino said in sport, "Maybe the dog swallowed it," referring to a cur which had been in the room from which the cash disappeared. Pessino killed the dog and cut open its stomach. There the bills were found considerably mutilated. They were pasted together and sent on to Washington for redemption.

There is a movement of making the northern peninsular of Michigan into a new State. The agitation of the subject is quite earnest. The northern parts of Wisconsin and Minnesota are to be included in the scheme.

Alleged coin counterfeiters have been arrested at West Superior, Wis. This dangerous gang is said to have placed counterfeit money in nearly every prominent city, and that of a kind to defy easy detection. The dies and spurious metal were also captured.

The electric lighting combine has been strengthened by the accession of the Westinghouse company, and the people will now be at the mercy of a great trust.

At Jackson, Mich., Lydia Patterson, aged 65, has brought suit for divorce against her husband, Alvin, aged 82. She charges infidelity, cruelty, and indecency. They have been married about thirty-eight years.

New York is the greatest mission field in America. In the Fourth and Seventh wards of the city there are 70,000 population and seven churches, and in the Tenth ward there are 47,000 population and two churches.

City Treasurer Foerster was found to be heavily short in his accounts with the city of St. Louis, and subjected to the vigilance of officers. The sensational character of the occurrence was increased by the alleged attempt of his son to burn the treasurer's office and destroy the records. The fire was promptly extinguished, and the son, aged 23, soon afterward committed suicide.

S. J. Carwell, of Rockford, Ill., grand secretary of the Home Forum Benefit Order, has received notice from Springfield stating that it has been granted a charter by the Secretary of State. The order was recently instituted there and has a rapid growth. Many new lodges are being organized.

S. M. Sawyer, a leading banker at El Reno, Oklahoma Ter., stated that members of the Dalton gang of robbers had looted his bank and carried off $10,000. Doubt of the truth of this statement, since no suspicious persons had been seen in the vicinity, led to investigation, and five indictments for embezzlement, etc., have been found against Sawyer.

Calhoun county, Ill., is to have a railroad, and then Illinois will be completely out of the woods. That is the one county in the State without railroads, telegraph and telephone lines.

A suggestion to unite Lake Forest University (Presbyterian) with the new Chicago (Baptist) University is being seriously considered—the latter to do graduate work, and the former, undergraduate work.

Definite steps have been taken toward the formation of a formidable rival syndicate to the whisky trust. The sponsor of the movement is the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association, the members of which held a long conference to consider what means could be adopted to successfully combat the encroachments of the combine. They propose to solicit subscriptions from members to erect distilleries and wage a war of competition against the trust.

Special prayers were made, last week, in the Salvation Army throughout the world for the restoration to health of "Colonel" Rahani (Lucy) Booth, youngest daughter of the founder of the order, who is sick in India. She is 22 years old. She has written several of the songs sung by the Army.

President Tillotson of the Maine State branch of the Federation of Labor says that his report at the coming annual meeting will show that the membership in the State has more than tripled during the present year.

Four of the men alleged to have poisoned several thousand non-unionists at Homestead, Pa., stand indicted. They are District Master Workman Hugh Dempsey, of the K of L., Robert Beatty, the man arrested at Louisville, and Patrick Gallagher and J. M. Davidson, the two informers who "peached" in order to save themselves. The grand jury returned true bills against the four on six different counts of assault. The cases will be put on the calendar at once.

Revenue marine service reports from Washington are to the effect that Canada is building three new armed vessels for lake service. The treaty of 1817 provides that only three armed ships shall be maintained on the international lakes by each nation except after six months' notice given by the nation desiring to increase its armament.

Four persons were killed by the New York and Chicago express train, near Elmira, N. Y. It is supposed that they were walking on the track during a severe storm that prevented their seeing and being seen.

NEATNESS IN GIRLS.

Neatness is a good thing for a girl, and, if she does not learn it when she is young, she never will. It takes a great deal more neatness to make a girl look well than it does to make a boy look passable. Not because a boy, to start with, is better looking than a girl, but his clothes are of a different sort—not so many colors in them; and people don't expect a boy to look as pretty as a girl. A girl that is not neatly dressed is called a slob, and no one likes to look at her. Her face may be pretty, and her eyes bright, but if there is a spot of dirt on her cheek, and her fingers' ends are black with ink, and her shoes are not laced or buttoned up, and her apron is dirty, and her collar is not buttoned, and her skirt is torn, she cannot be liked. Learn to be neat, and when you have learned it, it will almost take care of itself.—Exchange.

HOW TO IMPROVE AS WALKERS.

"Women do not possess much grace in their daily walk, and style and individuality are all that redeem the walk of the modern girl from actual awkwardness," remarked an observant old gentleman to a Louisville Post writer, as he stood on Fourth street watching the procession of fashion that passes along that thoroughfare every afternoon. "There are exceptions, of course, who possess freedom of action and grace, but, as a rule, women stride, shuffle, hobble or amble along in any way, regardless of how they look so long as they get there, and, though they may be possessed of beauty or wit, it is all spoiled by their ungainly walk. Any woman can learn to walk if she would take pains and practice. She should throw her shoulders back, and give the body firm above the hips, holding the gliding motion to the lower limbs, and at the same time avoid taking too long steps, which gives a girl a certain manly appearance that is not attractive. If women would keep in mind these facts they would soon observe a great change for the better in their walking."

TRAIN THE MEMORY.

A splendid way to improve the memory is to begin by treating it as if it were another person, and then charging it, upon penalty of a severe upbraiding, to keep until wanted the information, fact, date, name, or whatever is to be remembered. In this course you unconsciously do two things—you sort out things worth while to know and you impress them upon the memory in such a way as to cause it to grasp and keep them. The latter is a most important thing to do. Half of one's forgetfulness comes from failure to properly grasp what it is that you are to remember. It is said of Thomas B. Reed, the famous member of Congress from Maine, who was Speaker of the House of Representatives for two years, that he considered it a great hardship to have to tell a man the same thing twice. You ought never to cause any one such hardship.—Chicago Dispatch.

BENEFITS OF HOUSEWORK.

To keep the complexion and spirits good, to preserve grace, strength and agility of motion, says the Medical Record, there is no exercise more beneficial in result than sweeping, dusting, making beds, washing dishes, and the polishing of brass and silver. One year of such muscular effort within doors, together with regular exercise in the open air, will do more for a woman's complexion than all the lotions and pomades that were ever invented. Perhaps the reason why housework does so much more for women than games, is the fact that exercise which is immediately productive cheers the spirit. It gives women the courage to go on living, and makes things really worth while.

FARM NOTES

(From the Farm, Field and Fireside.)

AGRICULTURAL.

Ohio offers one free scholarship in her School of Agriculture in the State University to each county.

The farmer who thinks he is too poor to take a good agricultural paper is not apt to get much richer.

Is the agricultural fair as conducted in your county a benefit to you? If so, tell us how. If not, why not?

The executive committee of the Michigan State Agricultural society has decided to hold no State fair next year.

It pays in comfort and cleanliness to have footpaths from the barn to the house, and from the barn to the other farmbuildings. Try it.

Last year's corn that was good enough to rely upon for seed this year will do to rely upon next spring if it 'has been kept perfectly dry.'

This is a good time for the farmer to get some reliable person to do his chores, and take a week visiting farmers who are following the same branch of farming as himself—an exchange of ideas is helpful.

It is poor economy to let the farm manure go to waste and buy high-priced commercial fertilizers. Use the barnyard manure nearest where made, and the commercial fertilizers on the parts of the farm farthest away.

The various agricultural fair associations will soon be holding their annual meetings to make arrangements for their next fair. That is the meeting you ought to attend, to help form the plan for the exhibit next fall.

Now I fancy, says a writer in the Gleaner, I hear some man say: "The potatoes and other vegetables are worth something to feed stock in winter." Does he feed them? Generally they remain in the cellar until February or March, when he carries out decayed cabbages, apples and squashes; the potatoes have shriveled until he thinks he'll let them go until planting time, for he may need most of them. A merchant often spends more time in selling fifty or even twenty-five cents' worth of his stock, than in selling a $15 dress pattern. We say that is his business! It is a farmer's business to try to sell his produce instead of letting it waste. A penny saved in farming is worth as much as in any other business.

HORSE NOTES.

Don't neglect to have salt within reach at all times.

Give the horses a few potatoes frequently. It will help rid them of worms.

Never be satisfied with your horses if their coats stare and they appear dull.

No lesson of greater importance can be taught the colt than of standing still while one is entering or leaving the wagon.

Study the disposition of your horses and colts. Treat them quietly and kindly, and keep them clean; gain their confidence, and they will never go back on you in a tight place.

Much can be learned by observing nature. A horse will never stand facing wind in a pasture, but will always turn his back. A horse heated by driving can be founded in a few moments by standing facing the wind or in a draught.

The time to begin the colt's education is immediately after weaning. Teach him to lead and obey the word. The future usefulness of the horse depends largely upon the kindness and thoroughness of these first lessons. Don't confine him on a plank floor, but give him a run in a yard every fine day.

Look out for scratches. Many a fine horse is ruined by allowing the legs to go dirty. It takes only a few minutes to wash them clean and rub them dry. If the skin begins to crack, it must not be left, or it will become almost incurable. The skin must be kept clean and soft. Cut the hair off short, and paint it over with chloride of zinc and water—thirty grains to one pint of water. Put this on once a day and rub with glycerine. If possible, give your horse a box stall. A horse will keep in better condition and do more work if confined in a narrow stall.—Farm Journal.

AN EXPERIMENT WITH POTATOES.

A French chemist-farmer has made some remarkable experiments with potatoes, in one of which he obtained the enormous yield of 42 tons per acre. He selected the best and soundest tubers for seed, plowed very deeply, and manured heavily. Before planting, the seed potatoes were soaked 24 hours in a solution of six pounds of saltpeter and six pounds of sulphate of ammonium in 25 gallons of water. They were then drained and allowed to stand 24 hours longer for the germs to swell.

Look over these symptoms; headache, obstruction of nose, discharges falling into throat—sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid and offensive; eyes weak, ringing in ears, deafness; offensive breath; smell and taste impaired, and general debility. You won't have all of them at once; probably only a few of them; but they mean Catarrh.

And the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy mean to cure it, if you'll let them, no matter how bad or how long standing.

If they can't, they'll pay you $500 in cash. They mean that, too, just as it's printed.

They offer you the money—or a certain cure, if you'll take their medicine. But if they weren't certain of the cure, they'd never offer you the money.

NEWS OF THE WEEK (Continued from 13th page).

All of the blanket tribes of Indians in Oklahoma are suffering for want of food and clothing. The early settlers are sadly in need of clothing and they have not food for their cattle, which are dying by the thousand. In addition to their sufferings the people believe that the Indians will come down on them at any time. Unless more rations are sent to the Indians the forts will have to send out troops to put down the uneasiness. The blizzard raged for a week.

A man in the Nishnabotna Valley, Ia., has made a record of a corn crop, grown and ripened in eighty-eight days from the time the seed was put into the ground. The yield of corn will be seventy-five to one hundred bushels per acre.

John G. Whittier's estate foots up to the comfortable total of $130,000, which fact should not be without its cheering effect upon the vast body of poor poets.

Two old women have been arrested at Wilmington on a charge of fortune telling, under the old Delaware law against witchcraft, which provides a stay in the pillory and a fine as the penalty. This is the first time, so far as any one knows, that this old law has been enforced.

A report from New York says that the arrangements for the proposed consolidation of the lead and linseed-oil companies provides for the increase of the lead capital stock from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000, of which $5,000,000 is to be common and $5,000,000 preferred stock. This is to be given for the $18,000,000 linseed stock, or 27 7-9 shares of lead common and 27 7-9 shares of lead preferred for each 100 shares of linseed.

At Cincinnati, Charles Hazard, an employe in the Schell insurance agency, shot his stepson, Gabriel Benson, and his wife, Kate Hazard. The assassin was at Hazard's home. There was no provocation. Hazard was crazy drunk and shot like a maniac.

The defalcation in the Pueblo (Mexico) State treasury turns out to be larger than was at first reported. It is said that persons high in authority are implicated in the affair. The money stolen exceeds $250,000.

The safe of the Aurora, Ill., Brewing Company was blown open by professional cracksmen while the employes were engaged in the mill, only about thirty feet away. The sound of the explosion was heard for several blocks. The burglary was not discovered, however, until some time afterward. All the money and valuable notes were taken and the safe was ruined.

At Cherokee, Iowa, Sunday morning, a dynamite bomb was thrown with murderous intention at the Zion parsonage, occupied by Elder John Patterson and his family, falling a little short of the building, but exploded with terrific force, wrecking the porch and shattering the windows. The deed is debited to the liquor element, which has long been enraged by the efforts of Elder Patterson to secure the rigid enforcement of the prohibitory law. One of his sons, engaged as a special policeman, was instrumental in securing a raid recently on a restaurant of Frank Jugler. Twenty-three barrels of beer were seized and condemnation proceedings for their destruction were taken. It is thought that the liquor element planned the dynamite outrage in revenge, and the affair has created wide excitement. The beer was ordered destroyed.

The large number now under sentence of death, as well as the number indicted for murder, in New York has alarmed Empire statesmen, and they purpose to repeal the law of death by electrocution and substitute imprisonment for life.

The American Telephone and Telegraph Company, the corporation now maintaining long-distance service between New York and Chicago, is considering the advisability of connecting Chicago, St. Louis, and Kansas City. The rate for a five-minute talk from Chicago to Kansas City would be $5.

Now that the Wisconsin Convention has been held, Rev. M. A. Gault will visit Southern Illinois, lecturing and working in the interest of the Illinois State Anti-secrecy Convention, which it is now proposed shall be held at Coulterville, Randolph county, on Tuesday and Wednesday, January 24 and 25, 1893. He writes that the prospects for this convention are bright, as quite an interest in our reform work has been developed in Southern Illinois. Further information is awaited, and, if received, will be printed in next week's Cynosure.

The health of James G. Blaine continues very feeble, but his immediate death, notwithstanding all reports, is not expected.

A good brother residing at Salem, Oregon, in a private letter relates the following incident, again confirming the free-and-easy character of Masonic religion, which, its adherents claim, leads to salvation: "Within a few weeks two men have been buried here with Masonic honors—one a common drunkard, the other a Sunday-school superintendent. Both had held much good office, with good salaries, and both were assigned to 'the Grand Lodge above.'" Character doesn't seem to carry much influence in that institution.

With this issue of the Cynosure we have passed the threshold of the new year. It is a good time to review the mercies of the past, and to form new resolutions for the future. It is a season of hope, and should be one of unflinching confidence in Him in whom we live and move and have our being. The work of the past may not have been all that we could desire. Leaving our weaknesses with Him who is our strength, let us gird up our loins and press forward with renewed zeal towards the mark of our high calling. The fields are white for the harvest, and it is a good time to thrust in the sickle and gather in the sheaves.

What Rome thinks of Protestantism is shown in the following, copied from the Western Watchman: "Protestantism! We would draw and quarter it. We would impale it and hang it up for crows' nests. We would tear it with pincers and fire it with hot irons. We would fill it with molten lead and sink it in hellfire a hundred fathoms deep."

On the 23d of December all the cardinals in Rome waited upon the Pope and tendered him their congratulations in connection with the Romish festival of Christmas. In his reply, Leo referred to the threatening political aspects on the Continent, and condemned the Freemasons as "a malignant sect, who were never true to the people, but derived their support from the government." Possibly he has heard, as Mackey says, that "Masonry is not Christianity, nor even a substitute for it." Surely if the Pope of Rome cannot stomach the Masonic religion, it ought to disgust every honest American Christian.

The Illinois Legislature is about to begin a new biennial session; and the changed conditions of the political character of the State, and the opposition to compulsory education in secular public schools, and to the inspection of religious schools by State authority, are likely to produce some new and important measures. What the nature of these innovations may prove to be can only be surmised, but they are almost certain to favor the establishment of sectarian religious schools and the remodeling of the public school system until its usefulness shall be greatly diminished. The work of the session in this direction will be watched with no little interest.

An appeal from Rev. H. H. George, the Field Secretary of the American Sabbath Union, to clergymen throughout the United States, makes the following suggestion: "Will you, my brother, see to it, without fail, that not less than from twelve to twenty letters are sent by persons of your own congregation to your Representative and Senators in Congress before the 15th of January, urging them not to be deceived by any dust-throwing arguments for a repeal of the Sabbath-closing provision, but to set themselves against any such unworthy act, that on the face of it is a money-making scheme for Chicago. If you will act, and act promptly, the repeal will never be carried."

We have in hand, for publication in the Cynosure, the following addresses delivered at the New England District Anti-secrecy Convention, which will be presented to our readers in the following order, beginning with the issue of January 12: "Fundamental Objections to the Secret Society System," by Benjamin F. Trueblood, Secretary of the American Peace Society; "Danger to the Church and Family from the Lodge," by Mrs. A. J. Gordon, President of the Boston W. C. T. U.; "Masonry from a Woman's Standpoint," by Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason; and "Woman's Place in Reform," by Miss E. E. Flagg. Such a brilliant galaxy of truth and sentiment seldom centres about our "pole-star" of anti-secrecy reform.

A bill has been prepared by a special Congressional committee to establish a national quarantine for the prevention of imported epidemics. After providing for the detention and disinfection of vessels bringing diseased persons from foreign ports, the following regulation is made: "Wherever it shall be shown, to the satisfaction of the President, that by reason of the existence of any infectious disease in a foreign country there is serious danger of the introduction of the same into the United States, then in such case the President may, for the time being, suspend immigration until all danger from infection has passed." The bill is timely and judicious, and something like it will undoubtedly become a law.

In the course of a very truthful article printed in the Methodist Episcopal (Chicago) Epworth Herald, on "Manless Churches," the writer enumerates the reasons why "two-thirds of our church members are women," and "do about three-fourths of all religious work." No doubt all these reasons are valid, since they savor of selfishness and worldliness, but among them we call particular attention to the following: "The multiplication of social organizations has tended to win men from the church. Thousands of nominally Christian men are more devoted to the lodge-room than to the church prayer-room." This is solemn truth, and we are glad to see this accusation made by a Methodist paper, because it indicates that judgment is beginning at the house of God. The Cynosure has frequently made the same charge; but as it is undenominational, its warnings have not received the consideration which they deserved from the churches. We trust the Epworth League will never again suppress the truth which its organ has begun so pungently to unfold.

THE ABOMINATIONS OF SECRETISM.

ADDRESS BY REV. J. M. FOSTER, OF BOSTON, ON TAKING THE CHAIR AS PRESIDENT OF THE NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATION CONVENTION, DEC. 15, 1892.

(Concluded.)

It is but a few years since Strauss, in German, and Renan, in French, wrote "Lives of Jesus" for the million, which make him a mere man, and an imperfect man at that. All the lodges of Belgium subscribed to a presentation made to Renan in honor of his book; and when Strauss died the Masonic journal, Bunhutte, of Leipzig, called on "every Freemason to treasure up the ideas of that heroic illuminator of the lodges"; and adds: "Thousands and millions of brethren will sympathize with that great destroyer of the rubbish from the plan on which the future temple of humanity is to rise." The "rubbish" so hated by the lodges was the divinity of Christ! Thousands who read and wondered at the works of Strauss and Renan, did not know that they wrote as agents and as emissaries of the lodge.

To meet this anti-Christ; to turn back this inky flood of ignorance, timidity and fear which chloroforms now the press, the pulpit and the legislature of the United States; in short, to tear off this political, moral and religious shroud, which, like the fabled shirt of Nessus, enfolds our entire globe, God has given birth and being to the National Christian Association, and has thus far given it success. Leaving the Chicago building and its work in the hands of the three mighties—Blanchard, Kellogg and Phillips—men who were ready to go forth and meet the giant of secretism whenever the bugle sounded, Bro. Stoddard set his face toward "the city of magnificent distances," and within a few years he presented the Association with another commodious building, in the heart of the capital of the nation. This building is now occupied by his son, Secretary W. B. Stoddard, who makes this the center of his operations in the Eastern States. The light from that building ought to be so bright that the President and his cabinet, the Senators and Representatives and Judges of the Supreme Court, would all abjure the lodge. The trumpet ought to be blown so loudly there that every citizen throughout the land would hear it; and Bro. W. B. Stoddard is the man to do it. But the Puritanism of New England is the leaven that must leaven the whole lump. New England Puritanism drove out slavery, and it will yet banish the lodge. But as it was first purged of complicity with slavery before leading in that reform, so it must be purified from the lodge before leading in this reform. Recognizing this fact, our veteran reformer came to Boston; and, through his untiring efforts, sleeping New England has been aroused to a sense of her danger. He has walked these streets of Boston, distributing tracts, interviewing pastors, editors, lawyers, merchants, until his manly personality is better known here than Governor Russell's. He is sowing New England knee-deep with anti-secret literature. He has organized and chartered the "New England Christian Association," and secured for it a fund of over $15,000. He has enlisted such grand men as Joseph Cook, the Ulysses of moral reforms; Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, a leader of Christian thought and activity, upon whose fame the sun never sets; Rev. Dr. James M. Gray, whose lectures on the Apocalypse, five years ago, kindled the flame of righteous indignation that spread over the city more rapidly than the fire of twenty years ago, and gave pause to the aggressions of Rome upon our public schools; Prof. Luther T. Townsend, D. D., the reproduction of the lion-hearted antagonist of Rome in the sixteenth century, as well as the fearless censor of the weak and ungodly perversions of Protestantism; Miss E. E. Flagg, the Joan d'Arc of the anti-secret movement, and a score of others. President Lincoln was not more wise in selecting his cabinet than this reformer in the helpers he has secured.

It seems to us that there is just one thing more needful, and that is a suitable building in Boston as a home for New England work. And it seems to us that Bro. J. P. Stoddard is the man to complete the work he has so triumphantly prosecuted thus far. And when that is done he should be located in it for the remainder of his days, to reap the golden harvest that will follow his seed sowing.

The New England Association is auxiliary to the National Association, and in this is like the score of State associations that have been organized, east and west, north and south. It includes the New England States, and so is unlike the State associations in its widening purpose. These organizations are not separate integers, but one body. They are the grand army of the Potomac, marching on to Appomattox and the sour apple tree. They have two distinct objects to accomplish:

1. To purify the churches from the polluting presence of the lodge. The Saviour went up to the temple, and when he had made a whip of small cords, he drove out the sheep and the oxen, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and said to those who sold doves, "take these things hence, for it is written, My Father's house is a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." This Association must enter all the Protestant churches in our land, and with the whip of discipline drive out all the secret, oath-bound orders. Satan intrenched himself in the churches by the system of slavery. Some of Christ's disciples tried to cast him out, but he only rent the body of Christ and would not come out, until Christ came in his wrath and cast him out by fearful judgments. Satan has now intrenched himself in the churches by the lodge system.

You remember Christ's parable: When the unclean spirit is cast out of a man he goeth into desert places seeking rest, and findeth none. He returns to his house and finds it empty, swept and garnished. Then he goeth and taketh to himself seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and the last state of that man is worse than the first. So Christ cast Satan out of the churches in the late war, by destroying slavery. But they have taken him in again, in a seven-fold worse form, in secretism. A few of the churches are endeavoring to cast him out, but he only rends the body of Christ, as he rent the body of the boy out of whom the disciples at the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration tried to cast him. For this cause the majority of Christ's ministers are silent on the subject.

Now the message of the National Christian Association is: "This judgment must begin at the house of God. This demon must be cast out. The kingdom of light must be separated from the kingdom of darkness. Separation from the lodge must be made a term of communion, because the oaths administered are immoral and blasphemous; because the time and money belonging to Christ's kingdom are given to Satan's, and because their religious services are idolatrous. They sacrifice to devils, not to God.

2. To teach this government its duty in suppressing all secret, oath-bound fraternities. We hold that civil government is an ordinance of God; that the being, authority and law of the state come from him, and that the state is the arm of Jehovah, crushing vice, immorality and crime, and fostering and encouraging virtue and good morals. We maintain that the Lord Jesus Christ is the divinely appointed King of nations, and that his glory and honor are the chief end of national life. We contend that this nation should make a constitutional recognition of the crown rights and royal prerogatives of our Saviour-King and her pledge of fealty to his scepter. We insist that the Constitution should require moral and religious qualifications for offices of public trust, so that only the friends of the King of kings could administer his ordinances, and his enemies would be excluded. We demand that this nation shall make a constitutional recognition of her duty, as the divinely-appointed keeper of both tables of the decalogue, to prohibit the United States mail service, railroad traffic and Sunday newspapers on Sabbath day; to banish the murderous, thieving, blasphemous liquor traffic that breaks and tramples under foot every precept of the decalogue; to crush Mormon polygamy, and drive out speedy and easy divorce; and to outlaw all secret, oath-bound fraternities, which administer shocking and blasphemous oaths, make treason possible, always menace the public security and ever dishonor the King of kings. Let this message be read in the ears of the officers and members of all the churches, and of the rulers and people unto the utmost corners of the land.

It is a privilege which I prize highly to belong to the Reformed Presbyterian or Covenantan church, a body that never had a slave-holder in her membership; a body that would not allow a member of a secret, oath-bound lodge in her communion; a church that refuses to fellowship those Christians who fellowship the lodge, and refuses to enter the political body and to accept of authority under the United States Constitution which ignores the crown rights and royal prerogatives of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in many ways tramples upon his law, not the least of which is countenancing and receiving into political fellowship the lodge. We may not, we must not, strike hands with a political covenant which dishonors the reigning Mediator and places Satan upon the political throne in our land through the lodge system.

If you ask, "Why cannot all the churches thus cast out Satan?" I answer: "Because the anti-secret members have not faith enough to separate from them until they do cast out the lodge." And if you ask, "Why can the state not cast down Satan from the throne of political domination?" I answer: "Because God's children who abjure the lodge continue their political affiliations under Satan, instead of coming out as political dissenters."

This separation must take place before the lodge is destroyed. God did not destroy the world of the ungodly by the flood until Noah and his family—all God's covenant people in the world—were safely housed in the ark. God did not destroy Sodom until Lot and his family—all the children of God in the city—were brought out. God did not destroy Jerusalem until all the Christians in the city were taken and safely lodged in the mountain of Pella. God did not destroy slavery until New England had finally separated from the accursed system. And God will not destroy the lodge until his people in New England come out and be separate and touch not the unclean thing. We must refuse to commune with the church that fellowships the lodge. And we must refuse political fellowship with the government that charters and sustains the lodge.

Hymns have been sung in this convention. Permit me to declare my faith, that until man-made hymns are discarded, and the rugged, granite, God-made Psalms be sung, the Spirit of God will not have the material for forming the character that will successfully resist the lodge. Men's songs may be efficient; God's Psalms are sufficient.

JESUITISM A FOE OF OUR REPUBLIC.

A PAPER READ BEFORE THE ANTI-SECRECY STATE CONVENTION OF NEBRASKA, AT WAHOO, OCT. 18, 19, 1892, BY S. M. HILL, PRESIDENT OF LUTHER COLLEGE.

(Concluded.)

A closer study of their tactics will give the observer some clue as to their present plan regarding the future of this Republic. You can not have failed to notice that, lately, His Holiness, the Pope, shows a great anxiety for the glory and welfare of this Republic. He gave his special blessing to our Columbian centennial, a thing never before done to any International Exhibition. It was a cherished object of His Holiness to give us an American patron saint in canonizing the Spanish Admiral. Catholic congresses have been held to show to the people that popular government is just the thing practiced in the papal church. Prominent Catholic laymen were brought forth, to prove conclusively that with papacy there was no priestly rule. The layman had an equal voice with the ecclesiastic. Bishop Ireland of St. Paul has been traveling the country over holding fervid patriotic speeches on every available occasion. At all important political gatherings you see a Catholic priest along. Even the dedication of the Exhibition could not be done without their powerful aid.

The great patriotism of Bishop Ireland surprised many, and even some Catholics thought he might turn a traitor to the Holy See and be a real citizen of the U. S. instead of a dutiful subject of a foreign priestly potentate. Bishop Ireland was then summoned to Rome. Should it be for the purpose of a reprimand? Oh, no! This most dutiful son was petted and praised, and His Holiness sent him to the capital of the great European republic with instructions to the Catholic clergy of France to espouse the cause of the republican government.

This certainly is very significant. The French clergy has always looked upon the republic as a usurpation, and the Bourbon dynasty as the true rulers. Now a new policy is given them, and it is the American-born Bishop Ireland that carries the instructions. Furthermore there have been rumors circulated that H. H. intends to move to United States, as the land most congenial to his cause. These rumors have served as feelers to find out the humor of the people. No serious protests have been heard, and the Pope feels pleased.

But what is their plan? Do they yet dream of a Catholic world empire, with the Jesuits as the rulers back of the throne? Yes, I think they do. But the ruler in this new empire will not be a single dynasty of kings or their ministers, but the ruler will be the sovereign people itself. We all see that Jesuitism puts forth its greatest exertions, and is also favored with the greatest success, where popular government is most completely realized; and that is in Great Britain and United States. Look at their increasing power in old England. The Lord Mayor of London is a Catholic, and he has refused to perform certain functions of his office, because it was against his Catholic religion. And his action is defended by Jesuits all over the world.

The means of carrying out their policy are the same as of old,—education and works of mercy. Have you never heard about Sisters of Charity? Have you not seen their great hospitals in our cities? How many Protestant hospitals do we have? I am afraid our Lutheran church does not have above twenty in this whole land; and there are about a million and a half of us. And I am afraid that the sister denominations are not much better off, although the Baptists and Methodists have more than twice our number of communicants.

And what have you heard about the lady seminaries, the convent schools, colleges and universities of the Jesuits? Immediately after their order was re-established, in 1814, the Jesuit general at Rome sent over to Maryland teachers to establish schools. One school after another arose; the aristocratic families donated large sums of money and sent their children there to be educated. Is not the son of the great Sherman a Jesuit monk to-day? and the daughter a Sister of Charity? About one month ago I read, in the Omaha Bee, the eulogy over Loyola, pronounced by Father Sherman at the Jesuit celebration in Omaha. That shows their method and their success. They manage to get the wealthy classes by educating their children, and the poor by taking care of their sick.

Besides these old methods they have adopted the new plan of posing as very patriotic and very liberty-loving. And is not that right? The thief himself starts the cry: "Catch thief, catch thief," and thus tries to escape suspicion. But the Jesuit fox has too long a tail. All the rantings of bold and eloquent Ireland, all the boasted loyalty of the Catholic congress, all the patriotic effusions of the Catholic World and other Jesuit organs, can not deceive us. We are determined not to be hoodwinked, much less to be led from the West—our own glorious country—to the East—the radiant papal throne—in search of light, be it religious or political. The Light of the World and his glorious Gospel is all the light we want.

Now about their patriotism and their intense Americanism I have to tell you of a trick so clever, so thoroughly Jesuitical, and such a masterpiece of strategy that it must astonish anyone. The facts are these:

In the papal church there has always been a party opposed to the Jesuits, because of their domineering position. In this country this opposition consists of the German Catholics; for the Germans are by nature a liberty-loving people, even if we find them in the embrace of papacy. The Jesuits lead the Irish or English Catholic party. Now the German Catholics teach the German language in their parochial schools, while the Irish party teach only English. Nearly all the Protestant parochial schools in the land are supported by people of two tongues: English and German, or English and some Scandinavian tongue.

These protestant parochial schools had to be crushed, at any cost; for the Jesuits hate them above everything else. The Anti-Jesuit or German party within the Catholic church itself should also be crushed. Well, what was done? In one of their secret councils a bill was drafted, and, in a very innocent manner, brought before the Illinois Legislature as the Compulsory Education Law. A similar law was passed in Wisconsin as the Bennett Law. The aim of these laws was to kill the parochial schools of the German Catholics, and so cripple them in their opposition to the Jesuit or Irish English party. Then it should also, if possible, kill the Protestant parochial schools, and bring their supporters into disrepute as rebels and foreigners, thus keeping up and aggravating the Protestant feuds over which the Jesuits are so rejoicing.

That the German Catholic party has been driven to the wall by these measures can be seen by the fact that Corrigan of New York and Ireland of St. Paul are lately made cardinals, and both belong to the Jesuit party.

That they have succeeded in having one portion of the Protestants attack another is but too sad a fact. They could formulate and get enforced these laws without being suspected, because the laws affected a portion of the Catholic church. And these laws served the purpose of the Jesuits better than any other scheme that could have been invented.

But this is Jesuitism. We do not know where we have them, and before we are aware of it they have us dancing to their whistle. Don't you think they laugh, when they thus can steal a game upon us?

Yet another step was taken by the Jesuits. In conjunction with the infidel elements (or shall I say Masonic element) of Wisconsin they brought up a test case to the Supreme Court, whereby the Bible was banished from the State schools. That also served a double purpose: First, to lower the Bible in the estimation of Protestant and infidel children as a sectarian book, and as a book unworthy of a place in a system of education or of government. Thus, if the children of the State could not be educated as Catholics, they should be educated as infidels. Rule or ruin. Any thing to put out Protestantism.

The second purpose was to lower the State schools in the estimation of their own church members, as being godless schools. Thus their members should be more willing to bear the double burden of taxation for the State school and of voluntary contribution or tuition for the church school. Dr. D. H. Coulter stated, after reading of this paper, that the Blair Educational bill was killed by the Jesuits. Senator Blair had no less than twenty Jesuits pointed out to him on the floor, not in the regular Jesuit costume, but as reporters or managers of papers, or as lobbyists. And the Jesuit plan of campaign was to hush the bill to death, either by keeping the papers from agitating the measure or else giving it only a passing notice.

My friends, the great danger from Jesuitism for our school system is not, I think, that the Jesuits will control the State schools in order to have the Roman type of Christianity taught to the pupils; but the danger is that they will combine with the infidel and indifferent element, and have the schools secularized in such a way that infidelity and fanatic, anti-Christian hatred will be instilled in the minds of the young, thus making the school system a gigantic machine of destruction instead of a bulwark of defence.

And at popular elections they will prove such experts in wire-pulling and vote-catching that the balance of power will fall into their hands. The Jesuits and Catholics do not need to be the majority. In popular government the majority seldom rules. And with the power once in their hands, nothing short of the special interference of God's arm, or another war—a religious war—can put them out. They will tighten the thumb-screws on us poor deluded Protestants that did not have our eyes open, nor have sense enough to keep united against a common enemy.

Are we aware of their political power in these United States? Do we remember the surprising effect of the alliteration: Rum, Romanism and Rebellion? Do we remember the degrading humility our President showed the Pope on his Jubileum? And are we aware of the fact that no outspoken defender of Protestantism can be candidate on any party convention in this land? It prevented one man's name from coming up at the last Republican State convention in Lincoln. How many of our large cities are controlled by Protestant votes? In what fix are we here at home? Old puritanic Boston just barely escaped the clutches of Jesuitism a few years ago.

The city of New York is controlled by the Irish Catholic vote. That city controls the State of New York, and that is called the pivotal State in a Presidential election. The reins that direct the Irish Catholic votes go together in the hands of the Jesuits. Thus we see how near the election of our President comes to be determined beforehand in the secret conclaves of Jesuitism.

The results of the last election put an emphasis on this statement that could not be felt at the time of the reading of this paper. Let us keep a close watch on the next administration in its attitude towards Jesuitism.

People talk about and laugh at calamity howlers, but I am inclined to think the calamity howler a very useful specimen of humanity, if he were only howling the right kind of calamity. Old Elijah and other prophets were howling calamity at the top of their voices. Banishment, imprisonment, and even death, would not put a stop to their cry. And let us cry out with a mighty voice, ringing over the land and penetrating to high heaven: "Down with oath-bound secrecy, in whatever form it may appear!"

THE PRESENT STATUS OF THE SCHOOL QUESTION.

The Pope has, it is said, invested Archbishop Satolli here with full authority to settle all controversies in the Romish church in this country. This Mgr. Satolli has delivered himself on the school question. He has evidently learned that the Romish hierarchy have taken an unpopular course with regard to our public schools, and declares:

"The Catholic church in general, and especially the Holy See, far from condemning or treating with indifference the public schools, desires rather that, by the joint action of civil and ecclesiastical authorities, there should be public schools in every State, according as the circumstances of the people require, for the cultivation of the useful arts and natural sciences; but the Catholic church shrinks from those features of public schools which are opposed to the truth of Christianity and to morality, and since, in the interest of society itself, these objectionable features are removable, therefore, not only the bishops, but the citizens at large, should labor to remove them, in virtue of their own right, and in the cause of morality."

While he leaves it to the bishops to decide whether in certain cases parochial schools shall be established, yet he declares against a proscriptive policy with regard to Catholics who seek the best education attainable for their children. He wants an arrangement by which "Catholic children can be assembled during free time and taught the catechism." It is evident that many Romish ecclesiastics are convinced, as is Mgr. Satolli, that antagonism to the public school system of the country is unwise. They cannot be blamed for desiring that children should be instructed in morals and religion by their own priesthood. Whether, however, this instruction shall be given in the buildings belonging to the public is questionable. As Roman Catholics have, in every community, their own churches, why can they not gather their children there in the week after school hours for the instruction they deem indispensable? If Roman Catholics are recognizing that the public school system of the country cannot be overturned and are prepared honestly to avail themselves of its advantages, no sensible man will censure them for endeavoring to supplement it by such religious instruction as they believe is conducive to the welfare of their adherents.

It is certain that Rome has made a concession on the school question. Bishops and priests who have been dealing out denunciations on parents who send their children to public schools have received a check. The free air of this country is telling on the Roman Catholic church, and, however much Protestants may find in the past to disapprove, and however suspicious they may be of its purposes, all patriotic citizens may rejoice that it has found it necessary in educational affairs to yield to the demands of its more intelligent followers.—The (N. Y.) Christian Inquirer.

NOTES BY THE WAYSIDE.

"The evils of voluntary secret associations are certainly increasing and spreading. It is the minor orders which are doing more than anything else to destroy the power of the testimony of those churches that are constitutionally opposed to secretism. In my opinion, the best manner in which to meet the evil is (1) by total abstinence from every form of such associations by individual Christians; (2) the cultivation of a frank, open Christian character, and the exercise of the influence of such a character on others; and the general and judicious dissemination of correct information on the subject, especially among Christians."—W. R. Baldridge, Butler, Pa.

"The habit of secrecy is a bad one. It is the open candor that we like in men, not their secret cunning. The education of the secret society is all toward darkness. There is something always to be kept back from the public with which the mind of the secret, oath-bound man is burdened. He is bound to be on guard day and night, even against the wife of his own bosom. This habit grows with use. Men get to treading in ways that are dark and mysterious, until they know not what candor means. The light is to them as the shade of death. In this view alone men ought to shun the secret order as they would a pestilence."—Rev. J. A. Collins, of Chicago, in the Philadelphia Christian Instructor.

"I am as deeply interested as ever in the good cause that you are in, and only regret my inability to do more in advancing it. I have not found the lodge spirit so rampant in this place as it was where I lived in Alabama. There is no Freemasons' lodge here, but the Odd-fellows are quite strong. They often hold their meetings on the Sabbath, and many of their members are church-members also. . . . I shall ever be an ardent friend of, and a willing worker in, the cause. May God bless you in your good work!"—Rev. G. M. Elliott, Principal of the Beaufort (S. C.) Normal and Industrial Academy.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Boston's vote on License.—The N. E. Annual Convention.—A new departure.—Official changes.

Boston came within twelve hundred votes of No license, and now the Central Labor Union has asked for a recount, which begins to-day. Not that the Union has gone over to the Prohibition party. By no manner of means. But they have begun to see that liquor is the political foe of labor; that, being a vast and unscrupulous monopoly in itself, it will always be hand-and-glove with other monopolies; but however low and selfish their motives, the recount which they demand may possibly wipe out the twelve hundred majority for license; and if it can be proved, as they allege, that there was fraud perpetrated on a very large scale, the moral effect of the victory will be incalculable. Never did Boston come so near to having prohibition, and never before did the liquor party work more subtly to defeat it. Saloon men were not only active at the polls, but they subsidized the public press to such an extent that the Traveller was the only daily newspaper in the city which told its patrons to vote "No". It has come out of the political campaign with added honors; and if its contemporaries, which truckled to the saloon interests, do not "feel cheap" beside it, the reason must be because such brazen effrontery as the liquor party have displayed in the recent election is contagious. Even the staid, high-toned, literary Transcript, which goes into all the most cultured families in Boston, the homes of ministers, authors and teachers, can tell its patrons to vote "Yes," and forget to blush. Our grand temperance daily shows an increase of circulation which is most gratifying. In fact, to hear a person say, "I take the Traveller," has come to be equivalent to a passport of intelligence and high moral character.

Democratic Mayor Matthews was re-elected instead of Homer Rogers, and the city council remains materially unchanged; that is, more than half are Democrats and Roman Catholics. But the women, with Mrs. E. Trask Hill at their head, their gracious and heroic generalissimo, who if she is defeated never knows it, elected the entire school ticket, which was a triumph worth the having. It shows what could be done if Boston women were given the whole loaf, instead of being meanly put off with the crumbs. A woman in one of the wards registered while her husband lay dead at home, in obedience to his last request. In the light of such a genuine flash of the old Puritan spirit, we have no reason to despair of our republic.

Gen. Lawrence is first mayor of the new city of Medford, which now stands in the singular position of voting No license, while choosing, for her chief official, the proprietor of one of the largest and widest-famed rum distilleries in the world. He received, of course, the entire Roman Catholic vote; likewise the Unitarian vote, as some of his family are of that denomination. He was also supported by the deacons and many of the members of the Congregational church, who might read with profit John's message to the Laodiceans. With few exceptions, Tuesday was a day of triumph for the friends of No license. In Cambridge, Lynn, and other places the church bells rang a triumphant peal, reminding one of a generation ago, when they sounded out the death-knell of slavery. It is very amusing, by the way, to see the complaints in some of the papers, that sick and nervous people were disturbed thereby, while they neglect to state how these same suffering invalids bore the racket with which the victorious Democracy made night hideous at the recent Presidential election.

Our convention met on the day after the battle, when two fairs were in progress, and everybody busy with that holiday busy-ness which seems to leave no time or inclination to think of anything else. The attendance was good, under the circumstances, in spite of all these drawbacks; but our meetings would, without doubt, be more successful in point of numbers if held at an earlier date. The devotional services were full of strength and uplifting. One seemed to feel the invisible presence of Jehovah as these veterans, who had tried their spurs in the anti-slavery conflict, bore their glad, brave testimony against the lodge Baal. The same spirit of loving harmony pervaded our business meetings which has characterized them from the outset. The Masonic element seemed to be better represented than usual, but the interruptions from this source only brought out in stronger relief the difference between the spirit of Christ in those who had left the lodge for conscience' sake, and the spirit of anti-Christ in those who still adhered to its false worship.

The lodges, as it is well-known, make a great deal of "Ladies' Night"; so it seemed only fitting that our convention should do the same. This innovation, for which Bro. Stoddard must have the credit, was so successful that I wish it might be adopted as a regular feature in every anti-secrecy convention, North, South, East or West. Mrs. A. J. Gordon's address was, like herself—and no higher praise could be awarded—full of the sweet and winning personality which has made her so universally beloved, yet with that sharp incisiveness, that strength of moral conviction, which marks her as a born leader in reform. Mrs. H. J. Bailey, Superintendent of the Department of Peace and Arbitration in the World's and National W. C. T. U., could be with us only in spirit; but her letter to the convention shows where this noble woman stands on this great question. At her request she was most ably represented by her State lieutenant in the department, Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason—our Mrs. Gleason, for we have long claimed the right to use her name with the possessive pronoun affixed—and every one who has heard her knows that she bears a free lance, and is always at her best when attacking popular evils. It is a pity that all women who "think Masonry is a good thing" could not have heard her scathing arraignment of the system "from a woman's standpoint". Mrs. Gleason has recently been ordained to the ministry, and it is safe to say that under her preaching no young man will drift into oath-bound associations, and bind himself to more confidential relationship with rumsellers and libertines than with his own wife, unwarned.

The resignation of President Conant, who has served us so faithfully in our day of small things, whose generous hand has been ever open to help us to the utmost of his ability, and whose words of cheer and trust in our darkest and most struggling days have been as beacon-lights, was very hard to accept. But in our new standard-bearer, Rev. J. M. Foster, we have a worthy successor; one on whom rests the spirit of his covenanting forefathers, and whose gifts of voice and pen have ever been laid joyfully and freely on the altar of Truth and Right.

As regards Bro. Stoddard's change of field, I can hardly bring myself to write, except to say that bare resignation to what seems the Lord's will is as far as any of us—the writer included—has yet been able to attain. But we bless God that we can leave the New England work with One who makes no mistakes, and whose grandest purposes are often wrought out in the most untoward ways.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 28, 1892.

The opening of a new national administration with a public ball has long been a source of regret to those who believe that public balls are necessarily vicious in their effect upon those who attend them, and especially so upon the young of both sexes; but, if the publicly-announced intention of the committee which is in charge of the arrangements for the inauguration of President-elect Cleveland, made by one of its members, be carried out, the next inaugural ball will be nothing less than a national disgrace. Next inauguration day—March 4, 1893—will fall on Saturday; and for that reason the proposition was made that the usual inaugural ball be omitted and a grand instrumental promenade concert, to close before midnight, be held in its place. The proposition, according to a member of the committee, was discussed informally by members of the committee, and an informal decision reached in opposition thereto and in favor of holding the ball as usual; and now comes the disgraceful part of the programme—that the big clock in the ball room should be stopped a few minutes before 12 o'clock, so that the dancers may keep on without knowing that it will be Sunday. Now, is not that a shameful programme to be deliberately adopted by a committee charged with the important and honorable duty of arranging for the installation of the President of the greatest Christian nation on earth? There is still a possibility that a change in the portion of the programme which will involve a public desecration of the Sabbath day may be obtained before it is formally adopted by the committee; if not by appeals to the committee, then by a direct appeal to Mr. Cleveland, who will surely see that it would be little less than a defiance of Divine Providence for him to sanction, either tacitly or directly, such a violation of the Sabbath in connection with the ceremonies attendant upon his taking his place at the head of the United States government.

Again, the physician is a regular visitor to the White House. The patient, this time, is little Marthana Harrison, the President's granddaughter, who has scarlet fever. The White House, with the exception of the executive offices, is, as a consequence, closed to the public; and the ominous pink placard, with the words, "Scarlet Fever Within," has been tacked upon the private entrances to the house. The child has the disease in a very mild form, and, unless there is an unexpected turn for the worse, no danger is apprehended.

A very interesting discussion took place at a special meeting of the Anthropological Society, held at the Columbian University last night. The subject under discussion was: "Is simplified spelling feasible?" Among those who participated, either verbally or by papers submitted, were Dr. Alexander Melville Bell; President E. M. Gallaudet, of the Kendall Green Deaf and Dumb Institute; Prof. J. M. Gregory, of Howard University; Prof. Benj. E. Smith, editor Century Dictionary; Dr. Charles R. G. Scott, editor Worcester's Dictionary; Dr. W. B. Owing, of Lafayette College; Prof. L. F. Ward, of the Smithsonian Institution; Prof. W. B. Powell, Supt. Washington public schools; Right Rev. John J. Keane, president of the Catholic University; Mr. A. R. Spofford, of the National Library; and Dr. W. T. Harris, U. S. commissioner of education. No decision was reached.

It would have warmed the coldest heart that beats to have accompanied the flower mission of the W. C. T. U. when it paid its Christmas visit to the Washington asylum for the poor, Monday morning, carrying, in addition to the wagon load of fruits and edibles, cheerfulness to hearts that know little cheerfulness.

Impressive scenes are frequent at the alley missions, but there have been few more so than that in the Sunday-school in Glick's alley, Christmas morning. A man who had been known to most of the children in attendance as the wickedest man in the alley,—a blasphemer, a drunkard and a generally worthless character,—has been reformed since this mission began its work; and upon this occasion he addressed the children. He called their attention to his condition one year ago—all of them knew it well enough—and contrasted it with his looks and condition now; and at the conclusion of his remarks he raised his hands toward heaven and said with the most intense feeling: "Now, boys, if the worst man in this alley could be so transformed, what may not you accomplish? I, who was the disturber and blasphemer, saved by the power of God!" The faces of his young hearers, as they listened with rapt attention to his earnest words, were a study; and the scene will not soon be forgotten by those who were fortunate enough to have been present.

The Home for Incurables received a handsome Christmas gift, in the shape of a check for $10,000, accompanied by the condition that the name of the donor should not be made public. That is true charity; not ostentation.

GOOD WORDS.

The recent annual conference of the United Brethren in Christ (Radical) in Wisconsin declared:

"WHEREAS, We believe that organized secret societies are evil in their nature; and,

"WHEREAS, Anti-Christian combinations are rapidly increasing and clearly demonstrating their anti-Christian character, endangering the peace and prosperity of church and state; therefore,

"Resolved, 1. That it is the imperative duty of all Christians to refrain from connection with such combinations.

"2. That this is no time for us as a church to compromise with worldly secret associations.

"3. That we, as ministers and members of the United Brethren church, will seek through grace to overcome all such worldly conformity as would rob us of or destroy our usefulness."

REFORM NEWS.

"GO THY WAY FOR THIS TIME."

THE CHICAGO METHODIST PREACHERS WAIT FOR A MORE CONVENIENT SEASON.

The Rock River Methodist Conference is one of the most influential in the denomination. Strong in numbers, vigorous in spirit, firm and outspoken on such radical questions as lie at the bottom of the prohibitory and Sabbath reforms, it is not beyond hope,—it ought not to be beyond expectation—that no question which is of real interest and importance to the churches of Christ would not be entertained by them.

Thus arguing, I addressed a letter to the secretary of the conference, just before its fall meeting in Sterling, requesting that the relation of the secret lodge system to the kingdom of God be considered, in so far as the appointment of one or two members to attend the special conference in connection with our N. C. A. annual meeting would make it so. The secretary, Rev. Mr. Richards, did not probably find any member of conference who felt able to present the matter with a full understanding of it. The N. C. A. secretary could not conveniently be present, because of two other meetings that week. I am confident, however, that it was rather from a lack of information, than of conviction respecting the nature and danger of the lodge, that held back the N. C. A. request.

As no conference will be held in Illinois till next fall, and I wished the M. E. brethren to be represented, I applied to the business committee of the Chicago Preachers' Meeting for a few minutes to present our case. Dr. Bristol, one of the committee, is a Freemason, I am told; the standing of the others I did not know; but the privilege was kindly given on a recent Monday morning, and Dr. Mandeville, the president, was most courteous in his introduction; aware, probably, that mine was no easy task. I was heard at least patiently; I hope with some approval. A motion to accede to the request was made and was about to be put, when Dr. J. N. Caldwell objected that the meeting was not a representative body of the church; the general conference had refused to act on the question of the lodge; therefore, the M. E. church could not be regarded as Masonic or Anti-masonic, and the appointment of a delegation would be understood as some sort of an endorsement of the lodge opposition. He therefore moved to lay the matter on the table; which was done, after a standing vote was had to decide the issue. The vote was 21 to 10, and not half those present voted.

The report of one evening paper gave an exaggerated and untruthful picture of an excited meeting. On the contrary, the whole business was done quietly and with no manifestation of ill temper. It may have been an over-sanguine expectation, but it was nevertheless entertained, that a committee would be appointed, at least, on the N. C. A. request. I am confident that the M. E. preachers are more free to discuss moral questions than most of their brethren of the large denominations, with perhaps this one exception of the lodge. It is not so much dare not as will not; and the grace of God is sufficient for this also. Let us expect, brethren, from this church to come more and more to Christ's side of this question.

During the week following, the holiday rush interfered much with my work. At Elgin, Ill., the Free Methodist church is opened for a presentation of our cause. May God help that it be not in vain. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

THE COLLEGE AGENT IN THE SOUTH.

NOTTOWAY C. H., Va., Dec. 24, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Since my last letter I have taken flight, with the birds, farther south. I passed, on my way here, on the cars, by Appomattox, where Lee surrendered. We are southwest of Richmond, and some forty miles west of Petersburg, in the heart of "Old Virginia".

I am stopping with Rev. I. M. Rittenhouse, who is doing an important missionary work here among the freedmen connected with the Presbyterian church, North. He preaches to four churches in the villages around; and there are schools connected with each of these churches. One is a seminary for young women who are advanced in their studies, and numbers about a hundred students. The others are common schools; but two of them have two grades. Rev. G. Campbell, a returned missionary from Africa, has charge of the seminary; and there are six lady missionaries from the North, who are teaching in these schools. Mrs. Neil, whose husband fell in the war, has been engaged in this important work almost ever since. Near Amelia C. H., which is in the county north of Nottoway, I found two Northern missionary ladies teaching a large mission school, which Mrs. Neil founded a good while ago. Thus the Lord's work goes on and prospers.

I have preached in each of these four churches in Mr. Rittenhouse's field; and I have made arrangements to place a five-dollar library of anti-secrecy books with Mr. Campbell, to give information to these people, which they need so much. I expect (D. V.) to go to Norfolk next week Monday, to visit Hampton, and one or two places on the route.

The Presbyterian church, North, is sustaining these missions in Old Virginia, and many others in the South, and is thus doing a large and important work for Christ among the lowly. Here, as elsewhere, it requires much patient labor to sow the seed of the Gospel; and there is a necessity to give the freedmen warning against the tyranny and heathenism of the lodge. The Board of Missions for the Freedmen of the Presbyterian church has its office in Pittsburg, Pa., and has expended during the last year upward of $200,000 in this work, and they have sent 371 missionaries into the field. S. F. PORTER.

REV. M. A. GAULT IN WISCONSIN.

LODI, Wis., Dec. 24, 1892.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Last Sabbath, after preaching in the Arlington U. P. church, Wm. Caldwell, Sr., at whose home I took dinner, drove me over to Lodi, where Rev. J. D. Smith had a service arranged for me in the Presbyterian church. My stay with Bro. Smith, till the Monday afternoon train, was a revival of memories of former years, when he was pastor of Arlington and Caledonia, and arranged reform meetings for me. His health is improving by needed rest, and he has hope that he will soon be able to resume public work.

That evening Frank Jones was waiting for me at the depot at Wonewoc, and a sleighride of eight miles brought us to Valton, a country village, where a large audience greeted me in the Friends' church. Bro. Jones has the true reform spirit, and the tact and perseverance to work up a successful meeting.

The next day Rev. F. Decker, pastor of the Wesleyan church, at whose home I was entertained, drove me down the Little Baraboo Valley to Ironton, where we dined with Rev. O. C. Blanchard, whose testimony against secret orders has been heard in this community for more than twenty-five years. Here, also, resides Sister H. M. Mullenix, who has been pastor of the Wesleyan Methodist church at Tomah, Wis. She was present, and helped in my meeting at Baraboo. That evening I addressed a good meeting in the Free Methodist church at La Valle, a flourishing little town on the Northwestern railroad. The pastor, Rev. E. Bowrett, came eight miles, from Reedsburg, to help in the meeting. The main support of this church is Richard Klett, an enterprising business man, who entertained me, and was in full sympathy for our work.

The next evening found me at Baraboo, at the home of Rev. O. W. Watkins, a man of faith—enough faith to work up a good meeting for me in the Free Methodist church. My audience here consisted of Free Methodists, Wesleyan Methodists and S. D. Adventists. If they could all stand in line and present an unbroken front, their influence would be multiplied. It does appear that we are in the prophetic period of the slaying of the witnesses spoken of in the eleventh chapter of Revelation; not a literal slaying, but a disorganization and slaying of influence. In most cases the few faithful ones who are testifying against the powers of darkness are outside of the popular churches. They have not the means nor the influence to arrange a public meeting. The masses, even in the popular churches, are prejudiced against them—so much so that even when a meeting is held they will not attend it; and the tendency is more and more to reproach the witnesses. We have not yet reached the darkest hour. The churches, schools and court-houses are more and more going under the domination of the secret empire. The reform churches, such as the United Presbyterian, Covenanters, Wesleyan Methodist and Free Methodist, should concentrate their strength in a mighty effort to break this lodge influence and save this land.

The times of Elijah are again upon us. History is repeating itself. God forbid that we should permit our means and interest to be diverted to mission work in foreign lands, when a great crisis is just upon us. Let those churches that refuse to testify against these popular iniquities at home, and who have such a zeal to save souls in foreign lands—let them do that work. But those who have the Elijah spirit of reform—those churches who have the courage to testify against the popular evils of our times—should fulfill their mission to save our own land. M. A. GAULT.

THE FLOATING CHAPEL ON GREEN RIVER.

HENDERSON, Ky., Dec. 28, 1892.

Green river empties into the Ohio about 20 miles above Henderson, Ky. We pulled the chapel into its mouth, where we found a village of about twenty residences, floating on the water. When I was a boy it seemed so strange to read in the geography of the Chinese, many of whom lived in boats or houses anchored in the water or tied to the bank. I did not then think that I should ever see thousands of these house-boats along the rivers of our own country. Some are inhabited by fishermen, and others by laborers who find it cheaper to live in a floating house than to live in one on the land. If work is scarce in one place, the house-boat can be moved up or down the river. In this way a man can move without packing his household goods, and can change his place of residence as often as he wishes. Some of these house-boats are very poor shells, cheaply built; not over 6 or 8 by from 12 to 30 feet. Others are larger, and as nicely finished and painted as are any houses on land. Some house-boats are saloons—gambling dens.

Most people living in house-boats are without the Gospel, and their children without schooling. We gave them a good supply of papers.

It is very pleasant, as well as healthful, living on the water.

For $5 the chapel is towed eight miles up the river to Pike's Landing. The only two stores here are kept on boats.

At this place meetings are sometimes held in a log school-house. The people are very poor, and cannot support regular preaching; though they spend enough for tobacco and whisky to build a church and support a minister. They live in small log-houses of one or two rooms, have large families of children, and as many dogs. It costs them as much to keep their dogs as it would to keep a flock of chickens.

A man is said to feel rich if he has a revolver, a bottle of whisky and a dog. I ate dinner last

CORRESPONDENCE.

WORLD'S FAIR REPORT FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 21, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—A four days' hearing before the World's Fair Committee of the National House of Representatives on the proposed repeal of the Sabbath closing law has been appointed for January 10-13, from 10 to 12 A. M., daily. This will suggest earnest prayer to God during the week of prayer, and corresponding efforts in forwarding resolutions and voted protests to Congress, and especially personal letters to Congressmen and Senators.

While there is danger in the desperate efforts being made by the directors and stockholders of the World's Fair, in the supposed interest of their dividends, and especially because their pretense of devotion to the workingmen, and "pure religion" has confused some friends of the Sabbath, yet if every pastor and religious editor, and every wise leader of workingmen will pledge a dozen or more to write a brief letter each against repeal to his Congressman and Senators, and some member of the committee, named below, having the bill in charge, the repeal resolution will surely fail of passage, and may be killed in the committee, six of whom—a majority—voted for the Sabbath closing law at the time of its passage, namely, Dingley, Dolliver, Robinson, McCrory, Reilly, and Houk of Ohio. Of the others, Cogswell did not vote, but now favors repeal. The other four, Durborow, Lagan, Little and Wheeler, of Alabama, voted against the Sabbath closing law, but they do not, therefore, necessarily approve the "bad faith" of the acceptors' attempt to repeal the condition of an accepted gift, which even the infidel leader, Westbrook, condemns in the Investigator, and which business men declare if done in commercial circles would ostracize those guilty of the attempt.

In fact, one-half or more of those who voted against the Sabbath-closing law, judging by the canvass we have made among them, did so on "constitutional grounds," in alleged defence of "state rights" and "religious liberty," denying the power of Congress to forbid Sunday work at the Fair, even as a condition of an appropriation, which grounds will lead them, if consistent, to vote against two of the Durborow repeal resolutions, as they also contain, in each case, a Sabbath law; only in this case there is an unquestionable assault on "state rights," as these half-and-half Sabbath laws authorize violations of the laws of Illinois, while the law they aim to repeal harmonizes with the State law.

There are two other encouragements to expect victory if we deserve it by prompt and earnest effort, namely: (1) that the labor organizations which have been induced to favor Sunday opening have become alienated by the recent act of the directors in giving their printing to a non-union office; and (2) the admission of the advocates of opening that those who oppose the law and those doubtful, together, even now, after all their agitation, aided by labor unions and eminent prelates, number only 160, while 165 are firmly set against repeal, even by their own count.

It is significant of the tendency of the whole movement for repeal that the New York World is already pleading that the workingmen ought not to be put off with half a show, but should see on the Sabbath all that others see on other days, including machinery in action, in which they are more interested than in art. Partial opening logically leads to complete opening, and opening of this Fair to opening of other fairs, and so to general toil and traffic and turmoil, as on the Continent. The difference between complete opening and the proposed mixing of preaching with a colossal Sunday picnic is the difference between straight wickedness and a worse hypocrisy.

Let us bury the proposed repeal in a snow-storm of resolutions, protests and letters.

Gen'l Field Secretary American Sabbath Union.

NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

LETTERS RECEIVED FROM ABSENTEES.

WINTHROP CENTRE, Maine, Dec. 10, 1892.

MY DEAR FRIENDS AND FELLOW-WORKERS:—I sincerely thank you for your kind invitation to attend your annual convention on the 15th inst. I much regret that I cannot avail myself of this privilege. Previous engagements make it necessary for me to be elsewhere on that day.

I believe the outlook was never more encouraging. The evils resulting from secret societies, especially from those connected with schools and colleges, have become so alarming that the attention of thoughtful men and women is being arrested as never before, and they are willing to stand up for the right and against these evils in order that the great educational institutions of our land may become safer places for their sons.

It is well known that the secret societies of our colleges generally draw the students together for no good purpose. Their places of meeting are sometimes simply gambling dens, and open bars have been found there. Doubtless a large per cent of the young men who learn to drink while attending college acquire the habit by reason of their association with some secret lodge.

Another evil obvious in the secret society of the college is the manner in which the members of the society seek (often in unjust ways) to secure the honors of the college for each other. This caused the president of one of our oldest colleges to denounce the system of oath-bound societies.

While it may be somewhat difficult for our old seats of learning to rid themselves of this system, it is easy for the colleges yet to be to escape the bondage; and I am glad to see that Prof. Harper has so used his influence that the students of the University of Chicago are ever to be strongly advised to organize no oath-bound society; but, if they do institute one the authorities of the college are to have power to suppress it at any time. Would there were more Prof. Harpers.

One has well-said of the president of one of our richest colleges, that, instead of spending so much of his time in controversies on higher criticism he had better suppress the liquor traffic carried on by the members of the secret societies connected with the institution.

The Virginia Military Institution, at Lexington, obliged its cadets to sign the following pledge, viz.: "I promise that I will not, while a cadet, become a member of any secret organization existing in, or outside of, the Institute; nor will I attend any meetings of such society." If a school organized for the sole purpose of taking life in case of war is so positively opposed to oath-bound societies, cannot the church schools dispense with a system which keeps so many from the church of Christ?

Another encouraging sign of the times is the bold stand that the Roman Catholic church takes on the question. We should gladly acknowledge any influence that helps to keep our country a land of freedom. It has been truly said that "a citizen of the United States never loses his freedom till he becomes a member of some secret society."

Not only are the church and the college endangered by these organizations, but the home. How many men neglect the home to attend the lodge! for "the club has all the comforts of the home," as some one has said; and another has well added, "It would be well if the home had all the comforts of the club."

I bid you a hearty God-speed in your work.

Very sincerely,
HANNAH J. BAILEY,
Sup't of World's and National W. C. T. U., Department of Peace.

CHICAGO, Ill., Nov. 19, 1892.

DEAR FRIEND:—You ask my opinion of the secret lodge system. My observation leads me to say that it comes between a man and his family, between a man and his country and his government, between a man and his church, between a man and his religion and his God.

The vows to the lodge seem to stand paramount to all other obligations, and I find that even though a Christian, spirituality is lost; as for country, patriotism succumbs; as to home, the lodge has the preference.

Any system which produces such effects certainly is unworthy our support. This is the briefest arraignment which I can make of a system which has so much that is debasing.

Sincerely yours,

ESTHER PUGH,
Treasurer Nat. Women's C. T. U.

BROOKLINE, Mass., Nov. 23, 1892.

DEAR MISS FLAGG:—Your letter is received asking me to write something to be read before the New England Christian Association at Bromfield street church, in December.

I have not given the subject sufficient attention so as to be willing to give an opinion publicly. My general feeling is strongly opposed to secret societies; but I have never had the time, nor have I now, to inform myself as I would wish to do before making any expression against them. So you will have to excuse me this time.

Yours cordially,

ELISABETH S. TOBEY.

"THE TEMPLE," CHICAGO, Ill., Nov. 17, 1892.

DEAR MADAME:—For years I have been a Good Templar. It was the first temperance society I ever belonged to, and has done a great and good work in the temperance reform.

On general principles I am not, however, in favor of secret societies. I know little of the Masons, but have never known that any special good is served by that order, and should not like to have my son join it, or any other.

Sincerely and truly yours,

CAROLINE B. BUELL,
Cor. Sec'y Nat. W. C. T. U.

LITERATURE.

JANUARY MAGAZINES.

Home and Country for January is a handsome magazine, edited by Samuel Jaros, and published by Joseph W. Kay, 96 and 98 Maiden Lane, New York City. Some important improvements have recently been made in this periodical, which is now devoted largely to education in the home and the prosperity of the country, and purposes to make itself useful, timely and instructive to all members of American households, religious in sentiment, pure in morals and advanced in its teachings. Among the principal articles presented in the current number are the following: A Famous Painter, by Heinrich Hofman; At His Mercy, a New Year's Story, illustrated, by Sophie Kane; Women as Bread-Winners, by Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher; Mrs. Potter Palmer, by Mrs. Annie Wittenmyer; Arrested for Perjury, illustrated, by Jay Ross; Medicine and Physicians, by Isabella Johnson, M. D.; Mystery and Magic, illustrated, by Samuel Jaros; How Indians Write, illustrated, by Frederick E. Macgregor, C. E., Ph. D.; How to Organize a Stock Company; Notes on Insurance, by D. C. McMillian; Recollections of Africa, illustrated, by Henrietta Law; Dress and Science, by Mrs. S. S. Wood, illustrated; with sports and pastimes, shadow-pictures, etc.

St. Nicholas for January gives indications that as it grows in age this magazine is gradually becoming more sedate and wise—much more so than in former years. Whether this is an improvement in the interest of the publishers we know not, but it strikes us that the younger readers of periodical literature prefer something in lighter vein. Still the magazine has not lost one jot of its real worth. The serials of Holly-berry and Mistletoe, by M. Carrie Hyde, Polly Oliver's Problem, by Kate Wiggin, and the White Cave, by Wm. O. Stoddard, present new installments, with illustrations. Rudyard Kipling contributes an Eastern story—The Potted Princess. Thos. Wentworth Higginson describes, with pictures, Old Boston; J. O. Davidson, Battle-ships and Sea-fights of the Ancients, illustrated, and Daniel Judson, the Columbian Naval Parade, illustrated. Several poems, full-page engravings and sketches will attract attention, and the ordinary departments of the magazine are well-filled. New York: The Century Co., Union Square.

The value and utility of that unique literary publication, The Weekly Bulletin of Newspaper and Periodical Literature, published at 5 Somerset street, Boston, are to be greatly enhanced by the immediate addition of some important new features. Besides serving as a guide and index to the press of the country by affording a weekly classified and descriptive catalogue of the contents of over twelve hundred different papers and magazines, the Bulletin will hereafter supply the growing public demand for a review of the periodical press by devoting several pages every week to comprehensive summaries of the best and most interesting articles appearing in the monthly magazines and the daily and weekly papers.

PAMPHLETS.

By the courtesy of Postmaster-General Wanamaker we have received his annual report for the year ending June 30, 1892. Persons who desire to become acquainted with the vastness of the United States postal system will find it full of interest. Mr. Wanamaker says that his work in this department of the government has had "a strange fascination" for him. Few political or public documents can be read with so much pleasure and improvement. For copies, address the Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

"The Making of Cheese" forms the subject of Bulletin No. 18 of the Agricultural Experiment Station, University of Nevada, Reno, Nev., November, 1892. It is written by N. E. Wilson, B. S., the efficient chemist of the Station. Every dairyman in the country has a large and enduring interest in the work of these experiment stations and their reports upon current cultivation and development. The favorable reception by the public of the former Bulletin (No. 16), on the Creamery Industry has led to this intelligent outline of cheese and its manufacture. It treats of the chemistry of cheese-making, quality of cheese, varieties of cheese, composition of cheese, yield of cheese—how estimated, price of cheese, process of cheese manufacture, floating curds and their treatment, rennet, cheese-making apparatus (with illustrations), outfit for a cheese factory, and its arrangement in connection with a butter factory, the butter-fat in milk, prices of milk, etc. For copies of this pamphlet, apply to the Director of the Station, at the above address.

MUSIC.

Among the latest contributions to popular song and chorus music is "The Indian-Summer Time," words and melody by Will L. Thompson, of Liverpool, Ohio, author of several other favorite compositions. The price is forty cents; but if any one fancies this kind of melody, a copy will be sent on receipt of twenty cents.

OBITUARY.

MRS. RUTH E. SUTPHEN, of Evansville, Wisconsin, closed her earthly pilgrimage, December 18, 1892.

Sister Sutphen was born in the State of Connecticut, June 26, 1814. Of her early history and experience we have but little knowledge. We are informed that she came West in early womanhood, at the request of her brother, on the occasion of his wife's death, to take charge of his family.

In early life she experienced religion, and soon afterwards united with the Free-Will Baptist church, of which she remained an earnest and devoted member until about eight years ago. At that time she experienced a great religious awakening, renewal and quickening. This new experience was received in the Evansville Seminary, under the preaching of the first Free Methodist ministers, who preached in the chapel of the school building. As they presented the deep, searching truths of the Gospel on repentance, confession, pardon, holiness, and separation from the world, clearer light and deeper conviction reached the heart of our sister than she had ever before realized, resulting in her renewal and entire consecration to all the will of God. At this time she was led to unite with the Free Methodist church, of which she continued a faithful and conscientious member until she was removed to join the church of "the first born" in heaven.

Our esteemed sister was a woman of strong convictions, and of more than ordinary strength of intellect, and had retained all her faculties in a remarkable degree until the close of a long life. Her religious career was characterized with great simplicity of spirit and conduct. Modern society had no attractions for her. She appeared in society as one of the ancient people of God, not conformed to the world, but transformed. The house of God was the place where she delighted to be. Her attendance on the services within its walls was marked with punctuality and faithfulness.

Her last sickness lasted about ten weeks, during which she gradually ripened for the paradise of God. She passed away at a ripe old age.

Mrs. Sutphen was a friend and subscriber to the Cynosure, and was in earnest sympathy with it in all its reforms. Yea, she was a zealous promoter of the National Reform Society, and a praying and contributing supporter of the National Christian Association, in opposition to secret societies.

The funeral service was held in the Free-Will Baptist church. The sermon was preached by Rev. W. G. Hanmer, from the text, "Thou shalt come to thy grave at a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season." Job 5: 26. Rev. G. W. Coleman, of the Free Methodist church, and Rev. Mr. Moore, of the Free-Will Baptist church, assisted in the services.

Mr. Sutphen, her husband, died in the year 1884.

The place of her burial is described by the last verse of the hymn beginning with "Asleep in Jesus:"

"Asleep in Jesus; far from thee
Thy kindred and their graves may be;
But thine is still a blessed sleep,
From which none ever wakes to weep."

THE WORLD'S SUPREME COURT.

A recent article in the American Journal of Politics deals with the question of arbitration as the remedy for war, and suggests the establishment of a World's Supreme Court, for the adjustment of all international disputes.

Surely the professedly Christian nations might agree to institute such a common tribunal. The thought is not a new one, and the question has often arisen, how could the decisions of such a court be enforced?

We are glad to see some wise suggestions on this point. "Treaty relations would be recommended, binding all nations to the most rigid observance of the decisions of the court." If nations refused to arbitrate, "a provision would be placed in the treaty, that any nation bound by this great code of international law would do all in its power to force a rebellious nation to abide by the decisions of the court. To do this, it would only be necessary for the nations bound by the international treaty to declare the rebellious power no longer a member of the international union. This decision would carry with it the closing of all the ports of the union against the offender until such time as she should accept the decision of the court. Should the question involved be one of damages, the nations under the jurisdiction of the court should seize all public property belonging to the offender that came within its jurisdiction, until the judgment of the court should be satisfied."

We are not aware that the decision of an international court of arbitration has ever been resisted by either party.

The great point is to secure, in our treaties, some positive stipulation that all such disputes shall be arbitrated. A congress of nations, or a "confederation of the world," seems somewhat utopian, but all things which look to the doing away with the barbarism of war are deserving of most earnest consideration.

THE G. A. R. BUTTON.

A New England pastor, who is a member of the G. A. R., protests against our statement that an obliging Chicago detective released a prisoner on his showing a G. A. R. button, and our intimation that this detective understood his obligation. He says that we either do, or do not, know what that obligation is; that if we know what it is, then our insinuation is false; that if we do not know, then it was unwarranted.

He does not dispute the fact that the detective did release the prisoner, as stated, but thinks that, whether he did or did not, makes no difference in the case. But stop; if we are profoundly ignorant of the actual obligations of the G. A. R. (and this is what we are told by the members of all the secret orders), we have at least the right to judge of its nature by its practical workings. We may judge the tree by its fruits. When we see such a perversion of law and justice, the inference that it resulted from a mutual obligation is a most natural one. Besides, also, if our inference is erroneous, it is the most easy thing, by the publication of a single paragraph, to shame all traducers by giving the world the actual facts in the case. Should any one insinuate (whether in guile or honesty) that the local church of which we are a member had in its covenant some proviso that was immoral, we should certainly publish that covenant for the benefit of the world. We could not conscientiously do otherwise. If there was a clause in that covenant forbidding us to do so, we should surely feel that that part of the covenant ought to be broken.

But we are willing to admit (since our brother assures us it is so) that the act of the detective was a perversion of his covenant; at least it was only his, and not the authorized interpretation.

We go even farther, for we believe that the laws that sustained slavery did not have for their object the infliction of cruelties upon the slave, nor were our license laws enacted to promote drunkenness, pauperism and crime. We believe that when the slaveholder scourged the poor slave, or the rumrunner makes drunkards and criminals, the result is not what the law intended, but rather what grows out of the system under which they exercised their authority. We believe that the entire secret lodge system, to which the G. A. R. is no exception, is often used to pervert justice; and hence we object to the entire system, because it is capable of being so used.

But our brother says that when Mr. Gough was asked why he did not lecture against eating cheese, he answered that when eating cheese did as much harm as drinking whisky, he would lecture against it. So our brother says that when it can be shown that there are as many follies and evils in the G. A. R. as in Masonry and Odd-fellowship, it will be time to speak against it. But stop again; this proves too much; for it proves (if it proves anything) that the small fountains of iniquity are not to be arrested until they become mighty rivers, and that in preaching the Gospel he must carefully discriminate between great and small sins, rebuking the one and winking at the other. We do not believe that our brother preaches such a gospel.

"LET THE SUNDAY ALONE."

The Chicago "Sunset Club" held its regular meeting on Thursday evening of last week. About 700 ladies and gentlemen were present and participated in the banquet and exercises of the occasion. The subject for discussion, after the removal of the cloth, was announced: "Should Congress Allow the World's Fair to be Open on Sunday?" Mr. A. C. Hesing presented the European Continental Sunday, with its sports and pastimes, as a valid reason for making the American Sunday a holiday for working people and for admitting them to the Exposition grounds and such exhibits as may not be covered. Rev. Dr. Carlos Martyn, D. D., of the Sixth Presbyterian church of Chicago, replied. In the course of his remarks, he said:

"No, my friends, let the Sunday alone. Possessing such a day by the commandment of God, in the settled custom of the nation and in the long-established recognition and sanction and of public law, let us hold on to it. In the past it has been, in the present and future it will be, the conservator of all that is best and noblest in individual and in national character. In the name of the American law, in the name of the American usage, and in the name of the American conscience, I demand that as often as the Sunday recurs those gates at Jackson Park shall be shut."

In the general discussion which followed, short speeches in favor of keeping the gates closed were made by President Blanchard, of Wheaton College; George Royal, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; Robert P. Parker, and others. Robert Lindblom, E. O. Brown, and others spoke with vehemence and bitter denunciation against the "fanatics and Pharisees" who wanted to retain the American Sunday.

"SOONERISM."

"Soonersm" is the new name for a criminal offense in Oklahoma Territory. The crime may be prevalent in other localities, but the suggestive term is peculiar to the youngest of our enterprising out-lying districts.

The chief-justice of the Territory is credited with having said that "the cause of so many convictions for perjury in the district courts is a species of offense called 'soonersm,' which means the practice of those who surreptitiously entered the Territory before it was opened for settlement and selected the most desirable pieces of land and the best way to reach them when the rush that should follow the opening came on. Many claims are contested and the holder is accused of 'soonersm'! Witnesses swear they saw him across the boundary established by the government, and beyond which no man intending to enter for homestead was allowed to go (on pain of forfeiting his right to a homestead) prior to the day and hour wherein the Territory could be entered according to law. The accused swears to an alibi. If his claim is admitted by the court these witnesses are indicted by the federal grand jury, found guilty of perjury, and sent to prison, or, vice versa."

On this subject, the Oklahoma Christian Advocate (M. E. South), published at Guthrie, remarks: "'Soonersm' makes perpetual court terms in Oklahoma Territory, and it looks as if the government will need more prison accommodations before they are done, if the Cherokee Strip is opened within the next four years."

A PIECE OF IMPUDENCE.

In a recent trial, before Judge Brentano, of a civil suit, soon after the jury had retired for consultation, they sent to the judge the following communication:

"CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—To the Honorable Court: We, the undersigned, jurors on the Brown, Linquist, Ryan case, most respectfully request you to furnish us the following: 'One case export beer, one quart McBrayer whisky, one dozen Bass ale, three decks of cards, one quart Old Pepper whisky, one box Figaro cigars, dinner for twelve from the Sherman House.' [Signed by nine of the jurors.]

Of course the request was denied by the exasperated judge. Subsequently the jury returned a verdict of one cent damages in the case of a mother who had lost her child by the acts of the defendants. Then the court, boiling over with indignation, fined the nine jurors $10 each for contempt (and one of them $25 more for objecting), set aside the verdict, and granted the plaintiff a new trial.

So aggravated a case of barefaced impudence by a jury was never known before in Chicago—not even on the more uncivilized frontiers.

'CHRISTIAN MISSION COLONY.'

Rev. Wm. F. Davis, the well-known evangelist, of Mt. Washington, Chelsea, Mass., has furnished us the following data touching his new Christian enterprise, for which we cheerfully make room:

Accepted applicants can secure homes, school and church privileges, with useful and healthful employment, in an established colony of missionaries of the Lord Jesus Christ, within six months after their application has been accepted by the colony.

Widowhood, orphanage, color, foreign birth, destitution, or persecution for Christ's sake will hinder no applicant from reception.

It is estimated that one hundred dollars a year will be sufficient for the suitable maintenance of one of these Lord's poor, except, of course, invalids, or sick persons.

Romanists, oath-bound secretists, sectarists, poisoners, the covetous, seekers of worldly pleasures, the lazy, and any who are unwilling to live in Christian subjection to those in the colony who are vested with authority, need not apply.

Application may be made at any time by letter or in person between the hours of three and five o'clock P. M. on the sixth day of every week.

—Referring to the immensity of the grain trade of Chicago, the statement is made that 43,000,000 bushels more were handled here last year than during 1891. One cannot easily grasp the reality of such figures.

—The Cynosure, for itself and the N. C. A., heartily wishes all its friends and patrons a happy new year, and prays for a stronger and increasing bond of affinity and Christian love between us during the coming twelve months.

—The trial of Dr. Chas. A. Briggs, of Union Theological Seminary, for heresy, ended on Friday evening of last week, and resulted in his favor, none of the six charges against him being sustained. His majority in the several votes ranged from six to eighteen. Thus the Presbyterian church is seriously defeated in its war upon "higher criticism." The effect upon Christianity will afford a theme for thoughtful consideration hereafter.

—There is a call for the issue, in tract form, of the able address of Rev. James M. Gray, rector of the First Reformed Episcopal church in Boston, delivered before the New England Anti-secrecy Convention, December 14, 1892. It is entitled "Moral and Spiritual Counterfeits," and was printed entire in the Cynosure for December 22. A wider distribution of it would tend to greatly assist our reform work.

—From the Pope Manufacturing Co., makers of the famous Columbia bicycles, 221 Columbus avenue, Boston, Mass., we are in receipt of their "Columbia Calendar" for 1893, for the business man's desk, with a blank each day for memoranda. It is handy to have in either office or house.

—Mr. John D. Rockefeller has certainly been generous in giving $3,600,000 to the new Chicago University, which is scarcely 100 days old, but has already accumulated in money, buildings and grounds the munificent sum of $6,500,000—a princely endowment. The responsibility of the institution is proportionately great, and it cannot afford to neglect its glorious opportunities, as a Christian institution, for making noble men and women.

—The cause of agriculture loses a judicious counsellor, and the journalistic profession a prominent member, in the death of Orange Judd, who died last week at his home in Evanston, Ill., in his seventy-first year. Thoroughly conversant with analytical and agricultural chemistry, he successfully edited the American Agriculturist, Hearth and Home, and the Alumni Record of Wesleyan University. The Orange Judd Hall of Natural Science of that institution was the result of his munificence. He also attained considerable eminence as the publisher of agricultural and scientific books; was active in the war of the rebellion, and subsequently president of two railroad companies.

—A report comes to us through a daily paper which we can hardly credit, but which, if true, is only another forcible illustration of the truth of Dryden's apothegm: "Great wits are sure to madness near allied;" and seldom do we regret with deeper interest the alleged downfall of a Christian minister than that recorded in this paragraph: "The Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, has come out on a platform akin to spiritualism, or 'divine spiritualism,' as he calls it. He prays to become the medium of messages about business, politics, etc., that shall be of real service to the world." Certainly Satan, like the angel of death, "loves a shining mark." Dr. Parker, if this report is correct, is now in a condition to become a bright, misguiding light among the followers of Brigham Young, who believe in special revelations—such as they are.

week with a very pleasant man who had about twenty dogs that had cost him several hundred dollars. He is not a Christian, but says he will give $150 toward building a church.

The colored people had two school-houses about three miles apart, and had school ten weeks a year in each. One was burned; and for two years they have had no school in that part of the district, and will not have until they build another school-house at their own expense. In poor districts the church and school-house are one; so in this case they are left without either. They are not permitted to attend the white schools, and they are subject to insult if they attempt to attend white church.

Here is one great advantage of the floating chapel. It is common ground. All classes attend. It will seat about 500, which is about as many as could be seated in six or eight school-houses.

We have never visited a place where there was greater need of Gospel work than this. Probably one reason why they are destitute of the Gospel is because they have always been taught that if a preacher received a salary he was a hireling. The fruit of such teaching is heathenism.

Very few take any papers, but all are glad to get those we distribute; sometimes 500 copies at one meeting.

We hear such expressions as this: "I can't read, but my children can read it to me."

A few days ago my wife and daughters visited a colored family. The house was built on blocks about four feet high, to keep it above the water when the river gets above its banks. A box served for a table. They had a large family of children, but had no chairs. A few rags served for bedding. Beer and tobacco prevent home comforts. The mother cooked for a number of men at a sawmill, a quarter of a mile away. The oldest girl took care of the children. My wife asked her if she was a Christian, and she replied: "I have been to the mourners' seat, but did not get my religion finished." My wife prayed with them, and sent them some second-hand clothing, which they very much needed and were glad to get.

People are much interested and impressed by the pictures illustrating the effects of alcohol and alcoholic medicine on the human stomach.

A large portion of their earnings go for patent medicines.

Bro. Geo. B. Sweet, of Nashville, Tenn., has assisted us during the past few months, not only in holding meetings on the boat, but in school-houses near the river.

We intended to continue up Green river, stopping at all cities, villages and landings, giving lectures, holding meetings and distributing papers; but after lying two weeks, waiting in vain for an up-stream wind, we reluctantly leave the most needy mission field we have yet found, hoping to return when we get a steam tug with which to propel the floating chapel up stream. Our course will now be down the Ohio.

THE WISCONSIN STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

[Under this head we publish whatever has been received relating to this gathering.—EDITOR CYNOSURE.]

THE OFFICIAL REPORT.

POYNETTE, Wis., Dec. 30, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—We have had a good convention here.

The program was substantially carried out as printed, with some variations.

The address of welcome by Bro. Galloway was responded to by Bro. Fenton.

Though an attempt had been made by the lodge to get the church authorities to go back on their own action in giving the church for the meeting, when they found that the chief feature of our work was opposition to secrecy, the church was freely given.

Yesterday, after Bro. Hinman had spoken, in a general way, of the pledge of secrecy, Dr. Green, the pastor of the church (Presbyterian), asked if he could tell the audience positively what the pledge of a Mason is.

Bro. Fenton was called, and read from "Ecce Orienti" (published by Masons themselves in cypher, for their own use in lodges) the oath of the third degree. When this had been read the Doctor rose and said that he had looked on the secrets of these societies as child's play, but he now saw that it was profanity, and admitted that it was such a pledge as no Christian could consistently take.

Dr. Green himself spoke on "The Great Reform," according to program. His line of thought was that the pulpit needs reforming, in that the doctrine of the Word of God is not preached as it should be; that our colleges need reforming, to have a regular course of Bible study in them, etc.

Dr. Swarts spoke for over an hour in his happy vein.

The audience, last night, was large and appreciative. We were almost entirely boycotted by the lodge; but last night, I understood, a few of the Masons ventured in. Some young men, after the meeting, were inquiring privately, and seemed to incline to change a resolution, made before, to join the lodge. Yours truly,

ISAIAH FARIS, Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE CONVENTION.

WHEREAS, The chief concern of all Christians is to maintain and extend the Gospel of Christ as the true and only faith that secures salvation; and,

WHEREAS, Since the days of Cain and Abel there have been two rival systems of religion seeking recognition and authority—the first being that of salvation by works and ceremonies, while Abel's faith was in a divine atonement; and,

WHEREAS, The entire secret lodge system tends to, and does, inspire confidence in the Cain religion; therefore,

Resolved, 1. That we regard it as of paramount importance to make our most earnest protest against the entire system of organized secrecy, as injurious to Christianity.

2. That while we do not affirm that the object of the secret organizations is the perversion of justice and the protection of crime, yet we declare our abiding conviction that because of their inviolable secrecy all of these organizations are capable of being so used, and many of them are so used, and are therefore dangerous to civil society.

3. That while we deeply sympathize with all well-directed efforts to secure the suppression of the manufacture, sale and use of intoxicating drinks; and while we have a profound regard for the rights and interests of the soldiers in the late war, yet we see no need of secret organizations to promote these objects, and regard them as an endorsement of those secret orders that are sapping the foundations of Christianity and good government.

4. That the evils of Jesuitism are both in its objects and in the sworn obedience and secrecy of its members. It is these principles that make it a reproach to Christianity and a bane to civil society. While we would lift up our voice against it, we would also condemn all other systems that are based on secrecy and absolute obedience.

5. That we regard the spirit and practice of war as directly opposed to the Gospel of Christ: and, believing that arbitration is the remedy for war, we hold that all systems of military education, whether in the secret lodges, or in the boys' brigades as conducted by the churches, to be injurious to Christianity and a menace to civil society.

6. That believing our bodies to be the temples of the Holy Ghost, we deeply deplore the prevalence of the "social evil," and rejoice in all well-directed efforts to make men holy in both body and spirit.

H. H. HINMAN,

ISAIAH FARIS, Committee.

The foregoing resolutions were quite fully discussed in the convention, and adopted without dissent.

POYNETTE, Wis., Thursday Eve.

We praise God for our successful convention, which will close this evening. Our speakers were all on time and made excellent impressions, upon large audiences. The ministers in attendance are Rev. Messrs. Isaac Bancroft, from Monroe; Wm. Fenton, St. Paul, Minn.; H. H. Hinman, Waupaca; Isaiah Faris, Vernon; A. Longfield and E. P. Tullis, of Pardeeville; Robert Pate, Baraboo; C. V. Hughes, Portage; R. Harrison, W. L. Green, D. D., and J. B. Galloway, of Poynette, and S. H. Swarts, Chicago.

The climax was reached this afternoon, when Dr. Green, pastor of the Presbyterian church and President of the Poynette Academy, came out with his first public testimony against the lodge system, and arraigned it in a terrific manner. He and Dr. Swarts are our heavy artillery, and will unlimber this evening.

M. A. GAULT.

POYNETTE, Wis., Dec. 29, 1892.

We have just closed one of the best conventions we have ever had in this State. The attendance was good, the weather and roads fine, the addresses of a high order, and the spirit of the meeting most excellent. Set it down as a marked advance in our lodge-ridden State. Yours in Christ,

H. H. HINMAN.

M. N. BUTLER'S REFORM WORK IN MISSOURI.

BOLTON, Mo., Dec. 24, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—December 16 I visited Bethany, and thence to Loraine, eight miles away, leaving literature at dwellings, and searching out new friends; also arranging for future work.

From thence I went to Ridgeway, and out to Mt. Moriah, calling on old veterans of reform and arranging for speaking later.

Four miles south, at Sharon church, on Sabbath, I listened to an interesting discourse by Rev. W. S. Ballenger, giving a Bible reading that night, and the Entered Apprentice degree the next evening. These people are strong against the lodge.

Wednesday found me behind Father Neff's team, flying through the rural districts, putting literature into residences. "Masonry and Rebellion" was given at Brown schoolhouse, at night. The next evening was a repetition of this speech at the Stevens schoolhouse, and a pleasant visit with Mr. Daniel Neff, mine hearer and host, hospitable and entertaining, his ranch comprising thousands of acres, and who is feeding five hundred head of cattle, yet ready to attend and listen on this great lodge question.

Thursday night, again, at the Brown, an increased audience greeted "Masonic Religion;" and last night a full house at Bolton took in "Masonic Sun-worship."

HOW GOD CAN ANSWER PRAYER.

[Rev. M. A. Gault writes: "I never was so deeply impressed with the relation between prayer and the use of means as by a recitation at one of our Nebraska meetings. It was when Bro. W. C. Paden and I addressed an audience in the Swedish Lutheran church at Meed, near Wahoo. Miss Jennie Beebe drove over from Wahoo to attend the meeting, and at our request recited the following incident. She had been trained in elocution, and impersonated the characters so as to deeply impress the audience."]

"Madam, we miss the train at B—."

"But can't you make it, sir?" she gasped;

"Impossible—it leaves at three, And we are due a quarter past."

"Is there no way? Oh, tell me, then,

Are you a Christian?" "I am not;"

"And is there none among the men

Who run the train?" "No—I forgot:

I think the fellow over there,

Oiling the engine, claims to be."

She threw upon the engineer

A fair face white with agony;

"Are you a Christian?" "Yes, I am."

"Then, oh, sir, won't you pray with me.

All the long way, that God will stay—

That God will hold the train at B—?"

"'Twill do no good—its due at three,

And—" "Yes, but God can hold the train;

My dying child is calling me,

And I must see her face again!

Oh, won't you pray?" "I will!" A nod

Emphatic, as he takes his place;

When Christians grasp the arm of God,

They grasp the power that rules the rod.

Out from the station swept the train

On time; swept past wood and lea;

The engineer, with cheeks aflame,

Prayed: "O Lord, hold the train at B—,"

Then flung the throttles wide, and like

Some giant monster of the plain,

With panting sides, and mighty strides,

Past hill and valley swept the train.

A half, a minute, two, are gained;

Along those burnished lines of steel

His glances leap, each nerve is strained,

And still he prays, with fervent zeal.

Heart, hand and brain, with one accord,

Work, while his prayer ascends to heaven:

"Just hold the train eight minutes, Lord,

And I'll make up the other seven."

With rush and roar, through meadow lands,

Past cottage homes and green hillsides,

The panting thing obeys his hands,

And speeds along with giant strides.

They say an accident delayed

The train a little while; but He

Who listened while his children prayed,

In answer, held the train at B—.

CONVERSION OF A JEWESS.

A Jewish lady in Baltimore gave herself to Jesus. There was a protracted meeting in progress, in which there was noticed a Jewess several evenings. Afterward her experience came to the knowledge of the church in this way. Her husband, a gay man of the world, was in the habit of passing his evenings with congenial friends at the theatre and other places of amusement, leaving her alone at home. To relieve the monotony of an evening (the Methodist church, in which a protracted meeting was in progress, being situated in the same street), she slipped out, and, impelled by curiosity, attended one of the services. The first evening's service left no particular impression. The question simply arose in her mind just as a cloud floats over the sky, "Suppose that Jesus was the Messiah?" The next night Jesus again was preached, and before the sermon was over, the question became more than a question; she said to herself, "Jesus was, perhaps, the Messiah," and it greatly distressed her. On the third night the thought seized her soul and shook it through and through, "Jesus was the Messiah." Of course there came with it—inevitably to a Jewess—the conviction, "I am lost forever, for my people slew him." And in that spirit she went home sobbing and wailing. Her husband returned at midnight, and she met him in tears and said at once, "Go to some Christian neighbor's and borrow for me a New Testament." He tried to laugh her out of her impressions, or argue her out of them; but it was of no use, and, so for the love he bore her, he went out at half past twelve in the morning, and rang up a Christian neighbor. When he came to the door the caller said,

"I beg your pardon, but will you be so kind as to loan me a New Testament?" You may be sure the request was most cheerfully granted. The neighbor thought, "There is a work in that house to be done for Jesus to-night," and as soon as he could properly dress himself, he hurried to a Christian brother's and with him repaired to the Jewish mansion. The door was instantly opened, and the mistress met him with a smile, saying, "I have found Jesus!" And then she told the story I have told you, with this addition: She said that when the New Testament was put in her hands, she went into her room and kneeling, lifted up her face to heaven, and cried, "O, Lord God of my fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, give me light, give me light!" She opened the Testament with closed eyes, and chanced to open it at the beginning of the Epistle to the Romans. She read slowly, and the verses went tearing through her soul like hot thunderbolts, until she came to the sixteenth verse—"For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth, to the Jew first"—there she stopped; her bursting tears blinded her. She looked again. It is "to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." As she read these words she believed them and she knew it. When the Christian brethren came, she was a Christian.—Hebrew Christian.

LIKE JESUS.

It is not given us to write the life of Christ. A Hanna or a Farrar can do that; and thousands, as they read the glowing pages, admire him who is there portrayed, and are incited to imitation. We may wish that such a power to use the pen were bestowed upon us, but there need arise no envious thought. We can do better than to write that life—we can live it; and men shall take knowledge that there is one among them who breathes the air of heaven. We cannot paint the portrait of the Saviour, as Da Vinci did, helping millions to a better conception of the perfect One. But, after all, the best portrait is a loving human being, baptized with same Spirit and with a daily walk like his. This we may be. We cannot sing glorious hymns in his praise, like Klopstock and Milton and Wesley and Heber, but the unceasing hymn of a blameless life may go up to God from our hearts, and that is more acceptable in his ear than any form of words.—Rev. James Mudge.

THE REFUGE.

"In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence, and his children shall have a place of refuge.—Prov. 14: 26.

Away on the coast of Northumberland, there is a piece of land, which, twice in a day, is an island, and, twice in the day, is a continent. That sounds odd; does it not? Not like the definition you find in your geography books? No, but it is quite a right description, all the same, for this land I am speaking of—it is called Holy Island—is, twice a day, completely surrounded by the sea; and then, of course, it is an island; and twice a day, the sea goes back, and leaves three miles of good, firm, dry sand joining the island to what is the shore when the sea is up. You can then walk to the island on dry ground.

When I was there, as we drove across the flat sand, it was like driving over a desert. Here and there we passed strange-looking structures, something like sentry-boxes perched upon poles, and with steps leading up to them. These were placed all the way between the island and the shore, about two hundred yards apart, and the driver always kept near to them.

"What are these for?" I asked him.

"These, sir," he said "are refuges."

"What do you want refuges for?" I asked again. "Is there any danger?"

"No, sir," he replied, none just now, but there might be, soon. When the tide comes in, it comes very rapidly, and, if anybody is caught by it, he is likely to be drowned, unless he can make for one of these refuges."

Then he told me a sad story of some who had been drowned not long ago, because they had taken a road, all their own, from the island, rather than keep to the track where the refuges were; and the sea came rushing up, and they were lost, because they could not reach a refuge in time.

When I heard this I thought about Jesus Christ, and this thought came into my mind, "In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence." So long as we kept near to a refuge we had nothing to fear—we had strong confidence—but if we wandered away, at the very time we thought we were safest, the danger might be nearest. Yes, children, there are times when we think we don't need Jesus—we can be safe enough without him. That is a great mistake; there is never a time when we can afford to forget him or wander away from his side. It is only when we are keeping near him, when we are remembering him and loving him, that we can have a strong confidence, for it is only when we are near to him that we are really safe.

It isn't enough to know where the refuge is—everything depends on whether we are keeping near it or not. Those poor people who perished knew where they might have been safe, but, yet, they were lost, because they had gone so far away; and there are people who know a great deal about Jesus Christ, the only refuge our souls can have, but they don't keep near to Jesus; they wander away—away into sin, away into forgetfulness of the Lord; but, often and often, when most they think they are safe, the danger is upon them and they are lost. Be you wiser; keep near, near to Jesus. Keep near to him when everything seems safe, and, then, you will never have to fear when the floods of temptation come rushing in, or when the dark waters of death come stealing around.—Children's Messenger.

LITTLE THINGS.

Young people in beginning life are apt to be impatient of the first little steps that apparently make no advance, forgetting that seeming "trifles make up the sum of life," just as, in building, the little bricks, laid carefully, one at a time, side by side, and securely cemented together, make at last the great, strong structure.

A young man, having exhausted his patrimony in obtaining a professional education, settled himself in a town already filled with successful lawyers, to practice law. One day one of these old lawyers asked him how, under such circumstances, he expected to make a living.

"I hope I may get a little practice," was the modest reply.

"It will be very little," said the lawyer.

"Then I will do that little well," answered the young man, decidedly.

He carried out his determination. The little things well done brought larger ones, and in time he became one of the most distinguished jurists of his State.

Again, a certain old bishop, who was fond of finding odd characters in out-of-the-way places, was visiting in a quiet neighborhood. One day, in a walk with a friend, he came across a cross-roads settlement of a few houses. Among them was a snug little shoe-shop, kept by an old Negro man, which showed signs of prosperity.

Interested in the old cobbler, the bishop stopped for a chat.

"My friend," he said, "I would not think so small a business as mending shoes would pay so well."

"Ah," said the gentleman with him, "old Cato has the monopoly of shoe mending in this region. No one else gets a job."

"How is that, Cato?" asked the bishop.

"Just so, marster," replied Cato. "It is only little patches put on with little stitches or tiny pegs. But when I take a stitch it is a stitch, and when I drive a peg it holds." Little things well done!

The good bishop used that reply as a text for many a sermon afterwards.

A bright young girl, living in a mountain region, by accidental contact with some visitors at a near watering-place, became conscious of her lack of education and consequent mental inferiority to them.

She was intensely anxious to obtain this education, and at once set about gaining the money to secure it. There was absolutely only one way within reach. Near her home was a stream filled with mountain trout, which she knew to be in great demand by the proprietor of the watering-place hotel. She made an arrangement with him to supply fish for his table.

Every day found her with her rod fishing diligently, and every morning found her at the same early hour at the hotel with her fish. A benevolent old man chanced to see her one morning, and was greatly interested when told her story and the object she had in view in selling the fish; particularly when the hotel proprietor added:

"You will scarcely believe it, but this young girl is actually the only one—though I have tried many—who has kept scrupulously to her bargain. She never fails me, be the number of her fish large or small."

Thinking that such diligence in small matters deserved large reward, the old gentleman obtained the consent of the girl's parents, and out of the abundance of his means placed her at a school to be fitted for a teacher.

With painstaking care she mastered each difficulty in her new life, and became an educated, cultured woman and a skilled teacher.—The Christian Union.

THE BRIGHT FACE.

There is nothing that conduces more to the happiness of the home than to find a bright, sunny face looking into ours as we enter the door. The husband comes home wearied and worried with business cares; for bread-winners, the rank and file of them, find it a hard struggle in these times, when there are so many competitors. If the wife has a troubled look, or an unpleasant one on her face, it only makes its weight of cares heavier. But if the light of love shines in her face, it lightens the load and brightens up the outlook. The bright, sunny face in the home is a power for good that cannot be estimated. There is nothing like the cheerful, happy frame of mind which it helps to bring about.

So, dear ones of the household, wear happy, sunny faces, and see what wonders they will work when there are fretting, anxious cares and uncomfortable people about to deal with.—Selected.

A SCHOOLBOY'S TREASURE.

The contents of a schoolboy's desk are sometimes very amusing. I lately read an account, says the author of "How to be Happy, though Married," that was given by a master at a boarding school, of what he saw on one occasion when he had to superintend the opening and searching of some forty or fifty desks, in connection with a supposed theft of the football funds. A pipe, a pistol, and other contraband articles were found in some desks. In one, a tooth-powder box, full of ants; in another, silk-worms and lettuce leaves. A burst of laughter arose when, from another, was produced a small leather purse, containing, not the stolen money, but a young lady's glove. "When I came to the desk of nearly the smallest boy in the room," says the master, "a small parcel fell from the owner's hand. A queer, whitey brown paper parcel it was, bound round with string in the most intricate convolutions and series of knots. Of course, I had to examine that parcel. As I put out my hand for it the boy hesitated. The other fellows exchanged glances, as much as to say that we had run the fox to earth at last. Even older and wiser heads thought the same. There stood the frightened, anxious little boy, his blue gray eyes filled with tears, his fair face all marred with terror, and his soft, wavy flaxen hair, that gentle hands had; doubtless, smoothed this many a day at home, all tangled now.

"Please don't open it sir," pleaded the child, for such he was; 'pray, don't open it before the boys.'

"Had I followed my own inclination, I should have given back the parcel unopened. But that could not be. With my penknife I cut through the string, undid the many wraps of paper, and disclosed to view a little pill box, which might well have contained the missing money. I opened the box. There were no ants this time; no money either; but, nestled in a bed of wool, was a dainty locket, and with it a small scrap of paper, on which was written, 'For my dear Percy, with his mother's love.' The locket inclosed a piece of a loving mother's hair, and the little boy had been an orphan only a few weeks."—Church Worker.

A year's numbers of the Cynosure would make six good-sized volumes of valuable reform literature, containing 550 pages each.

"GO, AND HE GOETH."—LUKE 7: 8.

I said, "Let me walk in the fields;"

He said, "Nay, walk in the town."

I said, "There are no flowers there;"

He said, "No flowers, but a crown,"

I said, "But the skies are black;

There is nothing but noise and din."

But he wept as he sent me back:

"There is more," he said, "there is sin."

I said, "But the air is thick,

And fogs are veiling the sun;"

He answered, "Yet hearts are sick,

And souls in the dark undone,"

I said, "I shall miss the light,

And friends will miss me, they say."

He answered me, "Choose to-night

If I am to miss you, or they."

I pleaded for time to be given;

He said, "Is it hard to decide?

It will not seem hard in heaven

To have followed the steps of your Guide."

TEMPERANCE.

ALCOHOL IN SURGERY.

The Journal of Inebriety invites attention to the "Manual of Operative Surgery," by the well-known surgeon of the London Hospital, Dr. Frederick Treves, in which, referring to the risks attending operations on the bodies of drunkards, he says:

"A scarcely worse subject for an operation can be found than is provided by the habitual drunkard. The condition contra-indicates any but the most necessary and urgent procedures, such as amputation for severe crush, herniotomy, and the like. The mortality of these operations among alcoholics is, it is needless to say, enormous. Many individuals who state that they 'do not drink,' and who, although perhaps never drunk, are yet always taking a little stimulant in the form of 'nips' and an 'occasional glass,' are often as bad subjects for surgical treatment as are the acknowledged drunkards."

"Of the secret drinkers," continued Mr. Treves, "the surgeons have to be indeed aware. In his account of 'Calamities of Surgery,' Sir James Paget mentions the case of a person who was a drunkard on the sly, and yet not so much on the sly but that it was well known to his more intimate friends. His habits were not asked after, and one of his fingers was removed because joint disease had spoiled it. He died in a week or ten days with spreading cellular inflammation, such as was far from unlikely to occur in an habitual drunkard. Even abstinence from alcohol for a week or two before an operation does not seem to greatly modify the result." Dwelling on the immense importance to an operator of cultivating "a surgical hand," the same writer points out that "a shaky hand" may be developed by irregular modes of living, by the moderate use of alcohol, and by smoking.

CAUSES OF INTEMPERANCE.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, one of the oldest and ablest of female temperance workers, has just written a thoughtful article on causes underlying intemperance. It is not well enough understood that a man's habits of life often create a crave for alcoholic intoxicants. Among other things she mentions the use of food that is too stimulating, and an indulgence in tobacco, which demoralizes the physical system and is likely to beget abnormal desires. Both these causes ought to be guarded against much more than they are, and people ought to be instructed in regard to their danger. It is claimed, too, that too much indulgence in animal food is a source of danger.

The substitution of vegetarian diet and the avoidance of pepper, mustard and other condiments is said to be a great assistance to those who have any strong desire for stimulants to contend against.

Another cause enumerated is a much more general source of danger than is generally supposed. That is "the carelessness of physicians in prescribing alcoholic beverages to patients, and the immense use of those 'patent medicines,' whose chief ingredient is some kind of intoxicant, and which are self-prescribed for every ailment." The long line of poor human wrecks who may well trace the origin of their disaster to these causes is something terrible, if the actual truth was fully known. Incidents are often given by medical scientists of children who have contracted a crave for alcohol from what they have imbibed in their mother's milk—of mothers who have been advised by their physicians, or others, to use liquors of some kind while nursing. The too common use of patent or any other kind of medicines—even of those that do not contain alcohol—is no doubt injurious, as they are almost sure to have an unnatural effect both on the stomach and the nervous system, so as to seem to create an unnatural demand for something more than our ordinary food and drink.

The human system, in health, does not require that stimulation that strong liquors are sure to produce, or the soothing and narcotising that tobacco and many drugs are sure to bring about. The use of either is bad in health, as it is almost impossible for the user, even in moderation, long to remain in a condition of perfect health. They are often still more injurious in case of ill-health, as the derangements of the system they are sure to cause too often are thus made permanent.

True temperance surely includes the temperate use of things useful, and total abstinence from all things unnecessary and harmful. — Hamilton Temperar.

FIVE ACTS OF THE RUM TRAGEDY.

Rev. Dr. Talmage gives very concisely the five acts of the rum tragedy as follows:

Act I.—Young man starting from home. Parents and sisters weeping to have him go. Wagon passes over the hills. Farewell kiss thrown back. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act II.—Marriage altar. Bright lights. Full organ played. White veil trailing the aisle. Prayer and congratulations and exclamations of "how well she looks." Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act III.—Midnight. Woman waiting for staggering steps. Old garments stuck into the broken window-pane. Many marks of hardship on the face. Biting the nails of bloodless fingers. Neglect, cruelty, disgrace. Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act IV.—Three graves in a very dark place. Grave of a child who died from lack of medicine. Grave of a wife who died of a broken heart. Grave of a husband and father who died of dissipation. Plenty of weeds, but no flowers. Oh, what a blasted heath with three graves! Ring the bell and let the curtain drop.

Act V.—A destroyed soul's eternity! No light, no music, no hope! Despair coiling around the heart with unutterable anguish. Blackness of darkness forever.

"THOSE NASTY CHILDREN."

S. C. Hall, a noted English writer, once related the following: "A drunkard went to the public house for his glass. While drinking at the bar he heard the landlady angrily exclaim, 'There are those nasty children again; turn them out!' He chanced to peep through the window, and saw they were his own children at play with the children of the publican. Ragged and dirty they were of a surety, and certainly unfit to be the associate-companions of the boys and girls, well-fed and well-dressed, of the public house where he spent money that they might be so. Seized with a sudden terror of remorseful shame, he laid the half-emptied glass on the counter and passed out. From that hour he resolved that ere long his children should be as clean, as duly fed and better dressed than the children of the publican and the publican's 'lady,' fitted to be the playmates of children of a higher social grade than theirs. And, God aiding him, he kept his word. It was his last visit to the gin palace; the first and only lesson he had learnt there; and long afterwards, when he told this story to Mrs. Hall, it was with thanksgiving and prayer; when his children occupied positions much more respectable than that which those of the publican filled when the incident happened which changed the whole current of his life."

Intemperance is an overflowing scourge, which is sweeping this land like a besom of destruction. — California Voice.

Considerable interest was manifested at these meetings, and among the people. Six speeches, days of house-to-house canvassing, and rallying of anti-secretists, is starting the agitation anew in old Harrison county, and the end is not yet. It was a treat to converse with the venerable Father Neff and his sons, who are all men of high standing, firmness and hearty willingness to help on the agitation. Rev. Isaac Neff spoke ably for the truth at my meetings, and did much toward the arranging of appointments. The stay at his home was pleasant and instructive. He is high in our State, in horticultural matters, and the arrangements for fruit and vegetable growing are original, unique and very successful. Everything indicates thought, research and system. He is now in the midst of some important experiments that the State and government experiment stations will watch with profound interest. His artificial, never-failing spring for irrigating and watering his small nursery of select trees, also waters all his live-stock, and is a happy invention. In it is a hint to our road committees for vastly improving our highways at a minimum cost; and at the same time he has created the best artificial garden for experiment and the development of fruits and vegetables we have ever seen. Think of 300 gallons of Snyder blackberries on one-eighth of an acre of ground in a single season. Imagine a single hill of watermelon maturing specimens weighing from 27 to 65 pounds. Picture timothy 5 feet and 4 inches in height. Then raising peaches in this climate for eighteen years, without fail, by simply protecting the branches with straw and earth. All this, and much more, of profound interest and profit. He is billed for seven articles for the Missouri display of agricultural and horticultural exhibits at the World's Fair. A novelty was "Wild Corn Grass," succulent and nutritious, 5½ feet tall, thick as the blades can stand, and a tassel like our common corn, and that has been growing in his dooryard for 35 years. He has a limited supply of the choicest and most perfect stock of common fruit-plants and trees for sale, and our anti-secrecy friends wanting anything of that kind, and true and tried, should remember him. Of course his time is valuable and his regular business calls him much of the time from home. But he is a lover and a student of God's wonderful works in nature, and finds pleasure and profit in this side line, although considering the high grade of his select trees and plants, his prices are very liberal.

The anti-secrecy cause is strong in this county; and this hard missionary work and almost house-to-house canvass, if it can be pushed ahead, and thoroughly done, will bear fruit years hence. It is already telling in the right direction. Mercer and adjoining counties are eminently ripe. Let the "old guard" rally to the work and furnish the sinews of war—the funds so necessary to push the canvass.

Write me at Avalon or Darlington, Mo., and at once. Yours for right and good government,
M. N. BUTLER.

BIBLE LESSON.

STUDIES IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

LESSON III.—First Quarter, 1893.—January 15.

SUBJECT.—Encouraging the People.—Haggai 2: 1-9.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it.—Psalm 127: 1.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

DAILY READINGS.—M.—Haggai 2: 1-9. T.—Haggai 1. W. Ezra 5: 1-5. T.—Ex. 29: 35-46. F.—2 Chron. 5: 11-14. S.—Isa. 41: 8-14. S.—Rom. 8: 24-31.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The message of Haggai.—vs. 1-4. The building of the temple, so auspiciously begun fifteen years before, had been delayed through the opposition of their heathen neighbors, who by slander and misrepresentation had finally obtained an edict from one of the successors of Cyrus, which absolutely forbade their continuing the work. No wonder they were discouraged, especially when they considered how inferior in glory and beauty the second temple must necessarily be to the first, even had all things been favorable. It was at this darkest hour before dawn that the prophet Haggai came like a morning star, bidding them arise from their dejection, and be strong to do and dare for their beloved Zion. Another king now sat on the throne, who might be more favorably disposed, and no time should be lost in taking advantage of the changed situation. Among other valuable lessons we may learn (1) That the eternal God is never in a hurry, and often brings to a standstill the very work that seems to us most important to the advancement of his cause. (2) We are not to hold our hands and waste our time in idle regrets that we cannot do more. We are to arise and do what we can. (3) We are to watch for open doors and press in as we see opportunity. (4) We are to listen to the messengers whom God sends us; especially Christian reformers, who are to these days what the prophets were in olden times, sent to rebuke popular sins and waken the people from their religious lethargy. (5) We must be strong in the Lord, and have a sense of his constant presence. The more we realize that he is with us, the more we shall feel our own helplessness; but so long as we rely on ourselves, as soon as a work begins to be too great for us, when enemies oppose, and funds are lacking, we shall be ready to abandon it and sink down in indolence or despair.

2. The encouragement to continue.—vs. 5-9. By striking out "according to," and adding the last clause of the 4th verse thus: "For I am with you, saith the Lord of hosts, is the word that I covenanted with you when you came out of Egypt," we get the real meaning more clearly. Our weakness or cowardice does not annul God's covenant. He is faithful that hath promised. Could we but realize this, how trifling would seem the obstacles in our way; how puny every endeavor of the enemy to stop his work. "So my Spirit remaineth among you." Of this they had tangible proof in Haggai and Zechariah. If God's Spirit were not among them, they would have had no prophets. So the presence among us today of men inspired to rebuke prevailing iniquity, and incite the people of God to more courageous devotion in fighting sin, is a proof that his Holy Spirit is still with us. The prophecy which follows includes not only that shaking of nations which preceded the first advent, but all the agitation and turmoil which is to precede the second. And seeing how broad is the application, may we not take the exhortation to ourselves, "Fear not?" If God be for us, who can be against us? Why be afraid of the great world-power, Persia, continues Haggai, "for in a little while"—an expression which here means an indefinite period—"I will shake all nations." This prediction was fulfilled in the wars by which Rome became eventually mistress of the world; but it is now having its second and greatest fulfillment in the unrest which pervades the ranks of labor everywhere, and the agitation and alarm among the ruling classes. There is not a throne in Europe today that does not feel the throes of this great upheaval, which is eventually to lay them low in one common ruin; while the events of the last year show that America, so far from occupying any position of peculiar safety, stands on the very verge of the volcano. "The Desire of all nations." He who alone will satisfy all the longings of humanity. Even the heathen nations yearn after a Saviour, however darkly and ignorantly. The experience of converts from paganism amply testifies to this fact. The Revised Version has it, "the desirable things shall come." If we read the sixtieth chapter of Isaiah, we shall see that only the second advent can fulfill the prophecy in its broadest meaning. The Jews were thinking of the limitless amount of silver and gold lavished on Solomon's temple, and how meagre their own offerings, even though they used the utmost self-denial. So Christian workers and laborers in reform are perhaps more often discouraged because of their lack of means than from any other one cause. But how blessed the assurance, "the silver and the gold is MINE." "The glory of this latter house shall be greater than the former." This was literally true as regarded mere material wealth and splendor, for Herod made it one of the wonders of the world for the lavish costliness of its decorations; but the highest fulfillment of the prophecy came when Christ "taught in the temple," and his gracious words and healing touch gave "peace" to multitudes of troubled souls and pain-racked bodies. This whole lesson is a grand incitement to be builders, not of a destructible earthly sanctuary, but of that spiritual temple to which all nations shall yet gather, and whose glory is to fill the earth.

ESTIMATE OF THE LODGE BY EMINENT MEN.

THURLOW WEED: "I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the Anti-masonic excitement by a sincere desire, first to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of secret societies."

CHARLES P. SUMNER, father of the Senator, and a renouncing Mason: "Masonic engagements, whether they are called oaths, obligations, or promises, ought never to be made. They are not sanctioned by law and are not obligatory. They make it a Masonic crime to divulge that which the good of the community requires should not be concealed."

JOHN MARSHALL: "I never did utter the words ascribed to me, nor any other words importing the sentiment they convey. I never did say, 'Freemasonry is a jewel of the utmost value, that the pure in heart and life can only appreciate it fully, and that in a free government it must, it will be sustained and protected.' The fact mentioned in the resolution, that I have been in a lodge but once, so far as I can recollect, for nearly forty years, is evidence that I have no disposition to volunteer in this controversy, as the zealous partisan which this language would indicate."—Letter to Hon. John Bailey, Oct. 18, 1833.

HON. SAMUEL DEXTER, in an Open Letter to the Grand Master of Mass., 1798: "If there be no very important reason for upholding Masonry at a moment like the present, there is a reason against it. The system of the destroyers of human virtue and happiness is to undermine in the dark the castle that cannot be carried by storm. Secret agency has overthrown all the republics of Europe, and an extended, secret, leveling, self-created society, without any valuable object of pursuit, and embracing bad characters as well as good, cannot be the subject of approbation of an anxious patriot."

GEN. HENRY SEWELL, a Companion of Washington: "I was initiated an Entered Apprentice to the Masonic rites in October, 1777, at Albany, soon after the capture of Burgoyne, being then an officer in the American army. . . . I was led by the influence of this 'Perfect Rule of faith and practice,' during the year 1784, to view speculative Masonry in a shape still more deformed. Its character appeared to be selfishness, because restricted to its own members; its religion, deism, because entirely devoid of the Gospel. Its history appeared fabulous; its claims to antiquity, unsustainable; its titles, tulsome; its rites, barbarous and absurd; its oaths, extra-judicial, unlawfully imposed and blindly taken; and the penal sanctions annexed, horrid and impious."

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Speech in the Senate: "Secret societies, sir? Before I would place my hand between the hands of other men, in a secret lodge, order, class or council, and bending on my knee before them, enter into combination with them for any object, personal or political, good or bad, I would pray to God that that hand and that knee might be paralyzed, and that I might become an object of pity and even the mockery of my fellow men. Swear, sir! I, a man, an American citizen, a Christian, swear to submit myself to the guidance and direction of other men, surrendering my own judgment to their judgments, and my own conscience to their keeping! No. No, sir. I know quite well the fallibility of my own judgment, and my liability to fall into error and temptation. But my life has been spent in breaking the bonds of the slavery of men. I, therefore, know too well the danger of confiding power to irresponsible hands, to make myself a willing slave."

GEORGE WASHINGTON, in Farewell Address: "The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish Government, pre-supposes the duty of every individual to obey the established Government. All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive to this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation, the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community. . . . However combinations and associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of Government; destroying, afterwards, the very engines which had lifted them to unjust dominion."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

CHICAGO.

A train on the Fort Wayne road, Thursday morning, dashed into a crowded street car at a crossing, killing three men and one woman and severely injuring a dozen others.

The Columbian Exposition coin souvenirs (especial half-dollars) are now for sale at the banks and at the Exposition headquarters, for $1 each. Can be ordered by mail if postage is sent with the order.

On Tuesday of this week 13,000,000 new Columbian celebration postage stamps (all denominations) arrived at the Chicago postoffice. They can be ordered at the current rates.

The colored Masonic lodges held a union installation Dec. 24 at the hall, on State street, and over 200 Select and Master Masons were present to assist in the affair. Grand Master Thomas H. Smith installed the officers, after which a banquet was served. The invitations were limited to the members of the organization and their wives.

The report that a party of anarchists had arrived in the city last week caused considerable alarm.

James Williams (colored), in a West Side mission meeting, confessed to having committed murder and was arrested; but it was found, subsequently, that he had falsified his record.

COUNTRY.

W. I. Sachtleben, of Alton, Ill., and Thomas G. Allen of Ferguson, Mo., have arrived at San Francisco, Cal., from Vancouver, B. C., after making a tour of the world on bicycles. On June 20, 1890, they finished their course of study at Washington University, St. Louis, and then started out to make the trip. They visited Washington, D. C., and on June 23 sailed from New York, landing in Liverpool on July 4. Their bicycles were purchased, and their long journey began.

Kansas has in operation 8,874 miles of railroads, with only 11½ miles not operated. The annual report of the State board of railroad commissioners will be given to the governor in a few days. It will show that with the exception of two small branches of the Union Pacific every distinctively Kansas road shows a deficit in earnings.

The 400 coal miners who were on a strike for ten days, held a public meeting at Centralia, Ill. They claim that they are ready to return to work on the same terms as when they quit, but are locked out unless they return to the old system of screen mining in use before the passing of the gross-weight law.

The missing steamship Umbria safely reached New York on Saturday morning.

The amount of wool handled by Boston dealers and importers during the year has been larger than for a number of years past. The sales for the year amount to 172,000,000 pounds, showing the substantial increase over last year of 19,685,000 pounds. These figures include both the foreign and domestic wool sold, and they show an average weekly business of about 3,300,000 pounds. The next largest yearly business during that period was in 1888, when the sales were 170,494,000 pounds.

The year 1892 was remarkable for fewer failures than have occurred in any other year since 1886, the number reported being 10,344, or 2,029 less than in 1891. The indebtedness of firms failing was but $114,000,000 in 1892, against $189,000,000 in 1891, and about the same in 1890. The average liabilities of firms failing in 1892 has been only $11,000, the lowest average reported since 1878. In 1892 only one in every 113 traders failed, against one in every 93 in 1891, and one in every 102 in 1890.

Wednesday morning, last week, Milwaukee, Wis., had another very serious conflagration, and it was thought to have been started by a dynamite bomb thrown by some fiendish firebug. The loss of property was over half a million dollars. The building destroyed was the South Side plant of the Milwaukee Street Railroad Company. It is suspected that a conspiracy has been formed to burp up the city. The great conflagration was only two months ago. There have been five big fires since then, causing, including the one of Oct. 28, a loss of about $5,000,000. Several unsuccessful attempts at incendiarism on a large scale have been thwarted.

The popular vote shows that Mr. Cleveland had a majority of 950,000 against him, and that the increase of the Democratic vote from 1888 to 1892 was only 1.3 per cent. when the average increase of the Democratic vote for each four years between 1872 and 1888 was 19.5 per cent.

An explosion of natural gas at Osawatimie, Kan., caused a fire which resulted in the destruction of three two-story dwellings and the loss of four lives—Miss Anna Griffith, Mrs. Louise Kindle and her infant child, and Miss Fletcher, her housemaid.

News from the San Juan Mining Camp, brought by a courier to Bluffs City, Utah, reported a terrible battle, in which over one hundred shots were exchanged. He reported eleven men killed and a large number wounded.

A dispatch from Washington, Ind., says: "Jacob Dischart, who would have been 110 years old Feb. 19, died at the county poor farm. He was born at Heidelberg, Germany, came to this country with his parents in the year 1789, and settled in Virginia. He was a member of the Lewis and Clark exploring party. He was a lover of tobacco and liquor, and the oldest man in the State."

SECRET SOCIETIES CON-DEMNED

BY EMINENT EDUCATORS.

PRESIDENT F. H. M. HENDERSON, Bowdoin College, Ga.:—I regard all secret societies as extremely liable to be perverted.

PRESIDENT NOAH PORTER, Yale College:—That there are serious evils connected with them cannot be questioned; that they accomplish some good is equally clear.

PRESIDENT HITCHCOCK, Amherst College:—These, at different periods, have been fruitful sources of excitement, jealousy, and heart burning among the students.

JOSEPH MOORE, President Earlham College:—The fact that Freemasonry often thwarts every effort to enforce the law against an offender who is of the fraternity, shows it to be an obstacle to moral and civil progress.

HOWARD CROSBY, D. D., Chancellor University, New York:—Thirty years ago I was a member of a college secret society, and while I had upright fellow-members, and we encouraged literary culture, I found the association was chiefly a temptation to vice.

PROF. J. R. JACQUES, Illinois Wesleyan University:—Among college students, at an age when most susceptible, secret societies tend to breed that secretive disposition which is the very opposite of the truly candid, generous, and magnanimous character.

DR REYSCHLAG, Professor in the University of Halle:—Never entertain the idea to join the lodge for popularity's sake. It is utterly degrading to imagine pastors, men who have to deal with Christianity, the most universal and open thing in the world, wrapped up in the mummeries of Freemasonry.

PRES. J. BLANCHARD:—There have been civil and ecclesiastical pests ever since there was a government and religion; and Freemasonry is one of those pests. The Gains of humanity have rejected Christ and worshiped nature, and Nimrods have denied justice and practiced oppression. But both are combined in the lodge.

PROF. J. R. W. SLOANE, D. D., Reformed Presbyterian Theological Seminary:—But my strongest opposition to Masonry is because of its rivalry with religion. It steps in before the church, and is a false, an idolatrous religion, a religion without a Saviour and, therefore, a delusion and a snare to all who engage in it, or rest their hope upon it.

PROF. BURT G. WILDER, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.:—I am willing to hazard my position... upon the truth of the proposition that secret societies are unknown in heaven, but that they form a prominent and essential feature of life in the other locality. Light versus darkness; openness versus mystery; mutual confidence versus suspicion and distrust.

PROF. S. C. BARTLETT, D. D., Chicago Theological Seminary:—There are certain other wide spread organizations, such as Freemasonry, which, we suppose, are in their nature hostile to good citizenship and true religion, because they exact initiatory oaths of blind compliance and concealment, incompatible with the claims of equal justice toward man and a good conscience toward God.

PROF. J. G. CARSON, D. D., Xenia, Ohio:—These associations are inconsistent with the genius of Christianity, because the secrecy which they affect, and to which they bind their members by promise or oath, is unnecessary and so unwarrantable, dangerous, and ensnaring to the conscience, and, therefore, utterly opposed to that openness and publicity which Christ enjoins on his disciples both by example and precept.

PRESIDENT C. G. FINNEY, of Oberlin, 1868:—We have, then, the implied testimony of Freemasons themselves, that the Christian church ought to have no fellowship with Freemasonry as thus revealed, and that those who adhere intelligently and determinedly to such an institution have no right to be in the Christian church. In our judgment we are forced to the same conclusion, we cannot escape from it, we wish it were otherwise, we therefore sorrowfully but solemnly pronounce this judgment.

HOME AND HEALTH.

APPLES.

Chemically, the apple is composed of vegetable fibre, albumen, sugar, gum, chlorophyl, malic acid, gallic acid, lime, and much water. Furthermore, the German analysts say that the apple contains a larger percentage of phosphorus than any other fruit or vegetable. The phosphorus is admirably adapted for renewing the essential nervous matter, lecithin, of the brain and spinal cord. It is, perhaps, for the same reason, rudely understood, that old Scandinavian traditions represent the apple as the food of the gods, who, when they felt themselves to be growing feeble and infirm, resorted to this fruit for renewing their powers of mind and body. Also, the acids of the apple are of signal use for men of sedentary habits, whose livers are sluggish in action, those acids serving to eliminate from the body noxious matters, which, if retained, would make the brain heavy and dull, or bring about jaundice, or skin eruptions, or other allied troubles. Some such an experience must have led to our custom of taking apple sauce with roast pork, rich goose, and like dishes. The malic acid of ripe apples, either raw or cooked, will neutralize any excess of chalky matter engendered by eating too much meat. It is also the fact that such fresh fruits as the apple, the pear and the plum, when taken ripe and without sugar, diminish acidity in the stomach rather than provoke it. Their vegetable sauces and juices are converted into alkaline carbonates, which tend to counteract acidity.

MORBID SELF-INSPECTION.

Many persons who have many ailments of slight individual importance get a group of symptoms which is annoying and sometimes distressing, says a medical writer. These are apt to cause in those of melancholy temperament an anxiety in regard to health and a general concern in one's self. This continued produces a habit of making one's feelings a mirror, but this mirror, it may be remarked, is about as accurate in its reflections as the pieces of glass in a dime museum which make a lean man fat or a fat man lean and in general distort every feature. Headaches, pains over the stomach, backaches, feelings of fatigue, muscular soreness, depressed spirits and a multitude of other things, appearing singly and amounting to little, tend to give one an impression that disease actually exists where there is nothing that is tangible. This condition of ailment carries with it what is known as hypochondria—a mental affection which brings with it an introspection. Those who have a habit of putting in the balance their little complaints against nature scarcely realize the risk they run. Thinking of one's self and speculating on the outcome of this little thing and that little thing in the way of something extraordinary often makes an invalid out of one who is really in good physical condition. Hypochondria is a purely mental disease, born of internal feelings, but always outwardly expressed. Depression of spirits, a tendency to magnify little complaints and a searching after what does not exist marks its course. It is diagnosed with ease and can be cured by proper attention to a very few details. In your ordinary course of existence, do not drug yourself; take plenty of exercise; avoid the mirror, except for the toilet; let your conversation not include yourself; occupy your mind with sensible reading matter or home work, and, in a nutshell, forget that you exist so far as your petty ailments are concerned. It is only dwelling on trifles that makes a mental impression which develops with age and which has a well-defined tendency to create and maintain a morbid state of the mind. The sufferer thinks that she has had this complaint and believes her thoughts right in every sense. Those inclined to be hypochondriacal are advised to keep away from dispensaries and medical institutions in general, and to busy themselves with anything which will take "one's mind away from one's self."

MUSIC FOR INSOMNIA.

An English contemporary in a recent issue says: "A medical man sends to a Glasgow paper the following 'case': 'A relative of mine, who for many weeks had been suffering from insomnia, and become sadly reduced in bodily and mental strength, and indeed was in extreme depression of mind, was visited by a friend, a distinguished master of the piano, and one who has made a study of music as a means toward recovery of health. During his visit to the invalid he, by request, played some light, airy music, then went on to a nocturne of Chopin, and finally played the first two movements of Beethoven's 'Moonlight' sonata, where he proposed to stop, but was besought by the patient to finish the piece. The result was that the sufferer was lulled into a sleep and rested well that night. The cure was repeated for some subsequent nights, and now the insomnia is overcome. Surely this cure is preferable to chloral or other dangerous draughts, but doubtless it must be skillfully administered.'"

FARM NOTES.

CULTURE OF ASPARAGUS.

Asparagus is one of the best paying crops; it comes early in the season and is out of the way before strawberries. Plant four by four feet with good strong one-year-old, or good two-year-old plants as early in the spring as the ground is in good condition. The crown of the plants should be at least four or five inches below the surface of the ground when leveled and settled. This gives a chance to plow over all the surface of the ground in the spring after marketing.

The first season the ground can be occupied between the plants one way with early vegetables; early beets, lettuce, radishes, dwarf peas, wax beans, early and late cabbage—late cabbage can take the place of the earlier vegetables. Late cabbage planted in this way have netted me $75 per acre. You can grow some of the same crops the second year.

Asparagus should not be cut until the third year. It should then average a net income of at least $100 per year for twelve or fifteen years. This is always a sure crop and one that pays to ship to the large markets.

The above is an extract from a paper by H. K. Vickroy, Normal, read at the recent meeting of the Illinois State Horticultural Society.

MILK AND CREAM QUESTIONS.

Answers to the following will enlighten many who ask questions at creameries:

1. What is the difference in the weight of a gallon of milk and a gallon of cream— which the heavier?

Nobody can tell unless they know the butter-fat quality of the milk and the per cent of the serum in the cream. As a general truth, a gallon of good milk would weigh 8.60 pounds, and a gallon of cream about 8.24 pounds. To be exact, water being the standard at 1,000, cream weighs 1,012, and good milk 1,032. But the milk and the cream vary, as we say above, according to the per centage of fat in each.

2. How many pounds of cream to make a pound of butter?

It depends altogether upon the amount of the serum skimmed in with the cream. It takes pretty good gravity creaming from deep cold setting, and careful skimming, to get cream of which four pounds will yield a pound of butter. Open setting, and centrifuge work, give richer cream and more skim-milk.

3. How many pounds of cream will rise from 100 pounds of milk, of say 3 per cent, 4 per cent and 6 per cent butter fat?

There ought to be about 12, 16 and 21 pounds in the order named.

4. Does it require the same weight of each to produce a pound of butter?

No.

5. In "gathered cream" system, how long is the least and longest time that milk should stand (as usually kept by farmers) before skimming?

It will depend upon the efficiency of the creaming. The centrifuge will get it forthwith, ice-water next in order, open air shallow setting the next. The imperative rule should be, use the tools to get it substantially all, while the milk and cream are still sweet.

6. Should cream gathered during the day and delivered at from 4 to 6 P. M., be churned the same day, or held in vats till morning? At what temperature?

Cream should be churned before it is rank acid, whether that condition comes to it the day it is gathered, or next day, and churned at from sixty to sixty-five degrees according to the temperature of the weather.—Hoard's Dairyman.

BRIEFS.

What are you doing to add to the sunny side of farm life?

Are you doing your best to burnish the shady side of farm life—making it cheerful—the way to and from school pleasant for the children—the country schoolhouse bright?

It is a question with many English farmers how their stock is to be kept through the winter. The grass the past season has been innutritious and stock has gone into winter quarters in poor shape.

Suppose you debate this question at the next meeting of your Reading Circle: Resolved, That the Agricultural School is a better place to educate for practical farming than the farm of a practical farmer.

Mice are very fond of melon seed, and a good mouse dog in a melon patch will soon save many a hill of melons. Striped bugs are a great damage to melons some seasons, and rather difficult to manage. Some growers plant a few hills of squashes among the melons, and think they save melons by so doing, as the bugs like squashes better than melons. Sometimes sprinkling the vines with ashes or slaked lime will help keep them away. Plowing and hoeing disturb them and is quite a help, and is probably as good a thing as can be done. Sprinkling the vines with phosphate is also recommended.—Farm, Field and Fireside.

Count Bobrinsky, marshal of the court of Russia, has issued an appeal for aid for the famine sufferers in the province of Tula. There are said to be 173,000 persons in the province dependent upon outside assistance. The government relief is not sufficient to prevent the ruin of the inhabitants. The crops are an utter failure, and the condition of the farmers is even worse than in 1891. The rich have become poor, and the poor have become beggars. The peasants use the roofs of their houses for fuel on account of the dearth of straw, coal, and wood. Typhus fever is raging to an alarming extent among the people. The fever sufferers lie huddled together in their roofless huts without attendance and without bread.

Michael Davitt, the noted Irish anti-Parnellite leader, has lost his seat in Parliament on account of the intimidation of Irish priests during the recent election. His removal from Parliament gives the Parnellites great joy.

ILLINOIS STATE ANTI-SECRET CONVENTION.

The Illinois State Convention, in opposition to secret societies, and in the interests of other radical Christian reforms, will be held in COULTERVILLE, Randolph Co., TUESDAY and WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24 and 25.

Rev. M. A. Gault will hold meetings in all the adjoining towns, to awaken an interest in this convention, beginning at Coulterville, January 12.

The program is in the hands of a strong Ministerial Association comprising the pastors of Coulterville and adjoining towns. The list of speakers is not yet filled out, but Rev. J. L. Chesnut, of the Covenant church, will make the address of welcome, and Rev. D. L. Coulter, D.D., of Winchester, Kan., has been secured to make the response. It was for his family the town was named, and the announcement of his name draws large audiences at Coulterville.

It is hoped that Rev. B. Carradine, of St. Louis, will be secured for an address.

Rev. R. W. Chesnut, of Marissa, will speak on "Jesuitism a Foe of the Republic."

Among others who are expected to speak are Rev. Messrs. D. S. Faris, W. J. Smiley, A. S. Montgomery, N. A. Whitehill, of Sparta; C. M. Ritchie and Mrs. J. M. Sloane, of Oakdale; R. E. Wilkin, of Tilden; J. R. Wylie, R. C. Monteith and Mrs. R. C. Monteith, of Coulterville, and D. C. Stewart.

Coulterville has three strong anti-secret churches, and will provide ample entertainment for all delegates. It has two railroads, is easily reached from all directions, and is surrounded by the strongest anti-secret sentiment of any town in the State.

The addresses of Secretary Trueblood and Mrs. A. J. Gordon, in this issue, will well repay a careful perusal.

In next week's issue will appear Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason's address at the New England Anti-Secrecy Convention, to be followed by Miss Flagg's; and, at an early date, that of Rev. Prof. L. T. Townsend, D. D., on the same occasion.

In answer to an inquiry as to price of THE ARMENIANS, or THE PEOPLE OF ARARAT, by Rev. M. C. Gabrielian, M. D., which was reviewed in the Cynosure last month, we answer, The book can be had at the Cynosure office, and is sent postpaid for $1.00.

Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard, also president of the Illinois State Sabbath Association, visited Washington last week, to urge the claims of the association before Congress in behalf of the Sunday closing of the World's Fair. Congress is the battle-field where this issue is to be finally fought.

The Earl of Erne, "Grand Master of Orangemen," in Ireland, in a recent speech as reported in the Inter Ocean, said that during the whole home rule agitation in that country "not a single murder or outrage has been brought home" to any member of that lodge,—that is, no crime of this kind has been proved in court against them. This may be a good record or it may not. As the Orangemen are often as powerful in courts to defeat justice as the Freemasons are, the reason for failure to convict in court is quite as likely to be the manipulations of lodgery as the fact of innocence.

Thirty years have elapsed since the issuance of President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, and was duly celebrated in some localities, but not so generally as it should be. Says the (Afro-American) Christian Banner, of Philadelphia: "Twenty-nine years of freedom have done lots for us. Let us trust God, take courage, go forward, attend church, love and obey God, save our money, care for our families, pay our debts and be men." This advice is excellent. Now let our government indorse it by guarding the interests of the colored man as faithfully as it does those of the saloon-keeper.

Dedicatory services were held last Sabbath afternoon in Willard Hall of the massive and beautiful W. C. T. U. Temple in this city. Mrs. Carse, whose energy and taste have given Chicago the finest business building in the city, presided, and Mrs. Barker of South Dakota gave an admirable address. Noon prayer meetings, begun next day, will be continued regularly, making the third of the kind in the business center of the city. The original noon meeting, begun years before the fire in the First M. E. church block, has returned to the old place after moving first for years to Farwell Hall and then to Lincoln Hall. The Y. M. C. A. holds a meeting for men only in their rooms on Madison street.

The original character of the village of Evanston, Ill., founded by Hon. John Evans, in the interest of the Northwestern University and other Methodist Episcopal educational institutions, provides that no intoxicating drinks can be sold within four miles of the university. A municipal ordinance was also adopted, prohibiting the delivery of beer and spirituous liquors within the limits. Recently a beer deliverer was found distributing his wares about town, and was arrested and fined under the ordinance. The beer-man appealed the case, and last week a Chicago court, Judge Dunne presiding, declared the municipal ordinance invalid, the village board having exceeded their corporate powers, and the contract under which the beer was delivered having been made in Chicago and not in Evanston. Evanston will appeal to a higher court.

The Masonic Knights Templars have a great scheme, which was elucidated by "Sir" Cornelius Hodges before the Grand Commandery of Montana last September. Briefly (according to the published report), "he abates nothing of his estimate of the importance of reclaiming Palestine, or of the ability of Knights Templars to do it. . . . He does not propose that either the Knights Templars or the United States shall acquire Palestine for selfish use, but he does want the establishment in that land, 'under the general guarantee of Christendom, of an enlightened, liberal' (Masonic) 'Christian government,' etc. One of two things is certain: If they go there swearing by the Koran, they may succeed in getting control of the land by modern political methods; but if they undertake to invade it as nominal Christians, which they claim to be, the Rothschilds, for the Jews, and the Sultan, for the Mohammedans, will undoubtedly protest with considerable vigor.

Rev. O. P. Gifford, pastor of Immanuel Baptist church, in this city, has an article in the January Arena, entitled, "Why the World's Fair Should be Opened on Sunday." Its very first sentence is this: "Jewish legislation is not binding upon the Christian church; the Mosaic code is out of place in the American republic." Would he have us understand that he no longer acknowledges the authority which from Mt. Sinai announced that men should not murder, covet, steal, commit adultery or bear false witness, and also made it obligatory upon men to "remember" to keep the Sabbath holy? Would he have men break either of these laws, or all of them? His language is exactly on this line of thought; and he who does not honor God's day of rest because the Mosaic code is obsolete, must admit that the other nine commandments are also dead-letters. Yet, strange to say, but truthfully, no infidel has ever found it politic to condemn the Ten Commandments, which contain the germ of all laws for the safety and peace of mankind. Christ never annulled them; he came to confirm them, and to induce Jews and Gentiles alike to conform their lives to these divine requirements. See Matt. 5: 17-32.

FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTIONS TO THE SECRET SOCIETY SYSTEM.

A PAPER BY BENJAMIN L. TRUEBLOOD, SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN PEACE SOCIETY, READ BEFORE THE NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

There are certain fundamental objections to all forms of oath or pledge-bound secret organizations which, it has always seemed to me, ought to prevent men who respect their Christianity, their manhood, or even their ordinary common sense, from having anything to do with them. Of these objections he is just as capable of judging who has never seen the inside of a lodge as he who has taken in, or rather been "taken in" by, all the senseless and humiliating mummeries of some of the best-known of the secret orders. It is often asserted, with great show of wisdom, that outsiders know nothing whatever of these societies, and hence they have no right to pass judgment about them, as they have no data on which to proceed. But the truth is that secret orders, like everything else, have an outside life as well as an inside one, and of this they can no more divest themselves than a man walking in the sunlight can get rid of his shadow. Indeed, the outsider is in many respects better capable of giving a clear judgment than he who has gone in. For the latter, if fond of all that goes on in the lodge room, is blinded by this fondness to the errors of the system; if he feels the degradation of that which he has to pass through in some of the orders, the sense of humiliation which he experiences is apt to close his mouth against divulgence and his mind more or less to a perception of the real position in which he finds himself.

1. The first of these objections meets one at the outside of the door to the lodge before he has even entered it. Why should a man take an oath or pledge to keep that secret of which as yet he knows nothing? He is assured that it is all right, all harmless, all good. But if so, why should he not know it beforehand and then give his pledge of secrecy? "But that," says the secret-lodger, "would destroy the beauty of the thing and break up the whole system." Just here, I think, lies the fatal error of the whole thing. No man has a right to pledge himself to keep secret that of which he is yet ignorant, no matter whether it is right or wrong in itself. To do so is to take a leap in the dark; it is to shut one's eyes, or allow another to close them for you, and then to plunge ignorantly into one-knows-not-what. Can a sincere man who respects his conscience, his intellect, his liberty, do this? The oath-bound secrecy of the lodge has often been likened to the ordinary secrecy in which we keep from the knowledge of the world the things entrusted to us in the common confidences of life. But there is no real likeness between them. In the ordinary confidences of life, which are without oath, one feels himself at entire liberty to make disclosures where wickedness and wrong come to his knowledge, but in the pledge-bound secrecy of the lodge system most mouths are closed forever by the supposed sacredness of the entrance-oath. A proper understanding of this objection would, it seems to me, keep all intelligent young men out of the secret orders, from Masonry down to those which are seemingly harmless. For whoever swears to keep secret things yet unknown to him sells out his liberty and his manhood, and he may be called upon at any time afterwards to deliver himself up to this self-imposed slavery, if he have not the courage to back out and expose the whole thing.

2. The second objection of this fundamental character is that the oath of a pledge-bound lodge system not only tends to create, but actually does create, in a very strong way the conviction that all oaths or pledges are equally inviolable. No moral perversion could be greater than this. There are pledges that are absolutely sacred, which cannot be broken without sin; but no pledge to do evil has any binding force whatever. A pledge which is undetermined, like that of the secret lodge, which may turn out to be a pledge to do evil or to do well, as the case may be, obliterates this distinction and tends powerfully to destroy the foundations of morality. How often one hears some defender of the secret society say, that a man who will violate his oath is one of the basest of men and undeserving of any confidence. This he thinks an argument suitable to silence all opponents. But the dangerous feature of his reasoning is that he talks that which is true of the righteous oath and applies it to that two-faced pledge of the secret lodge which has blinded so many people's eyes. A man who breaks an oath to do evil is not only not a base man, but he has done a good and meritorious deed.

It is infinitely better, however, never to take such an oath, nor one that is liable to turn out such in practice.

3. A third objection to all secret orders is no less grave than these two. They create in society the habit of a covert and concealed method of accomplishing ends which is radically contrary to the frank and open ways of the truth. Evil and designing men are only too ready to take advantage of this spirit of concealment for the accomplishment of their base purposes. Good men who have connected themselves with lodges and followed their secret methods have been, it seems to me, very much responsible for the widespread prevalence in society to-day of a lurking, treacherous spirit which does its work in the dark, and whose presence it is nearly impossible to detect until it has executed its cruel and deadly schemes. I do not claim that this spirit has been created by the lodge system. It is the natural characteristic of evil to proceed in the dark ways.

The lodge itself originated in this concealing spirit; but as systematized and developed in modern times, and fostered and upheld by good and professed Christian men, the lodge has strengthened and intensified this spirit until it has become many times more potent for evil than formerly. It is no longer the simple, spontaneous spirit of evil, but has grown into a systematic and well-trained power, against which justice with its juries and its witness-boxes struggles often in vain. To attempt to counteract and destroy the force of this spirit by forming or entering into secret associations yourselves is to clothe yourselves in the garments of darkness and to walk in the ways of darkness.

The only way to counteract the system is for all good men to break alliance with it forever and throw the weight of their individual and combined force against it.

4. In the fourth place, the damage done to individual character in the fostering of a spirit of falsehood and prevarication is one of the most serious evils of the system which we are discussing. There are many questions that may be put to a member of the lodge which the order forbids him to answer in a direct, straightforward way. He is compelled to seek round-about phrases and ambiguous expressions in which to couch his replies, if he continues to be a true and obedient son of secrecy. One cannot follow this course long without engraving its marks very deeply upon his character. Indeed, it sometimes becomes the visible evidence of a secret-society man, and you cannot be many days in his company without becoming painfully conscious of a barrier between him and you, which there is no way of removing. When you speak on certain subjects he is at once seized with a distant and mysterious air, which at once closes up the channels of free and hearty intercourse. You are left standing in the conversation, and are puzzled to know in which way to pull your rudder in order to escape. This habit of round-aboutness and ambiguity is almost sure to pervade the whole life and create a spirit of twisting and prevarication which is not far removed from the sin of common lying. A system whose foundation principles tend to produce this type of human character deserves the out-spoken condemnation of all truth-loving men.

5. The limited time at my command will allow me to present only one other of these radical objections to secret societies. This is found in the nature of their appeal for membership. Some of them claim to make no direct effort to secure members. But they all make an appeal which, though indirect, is very powerful in drawing young men into their ranks. This appeal is two-fold, and is made to the lower rather than the higher nature. In the first place, the cloak of mystery which is thrown around these institutions appeals very strongly to the prying curiosity of human nature and draws men into the lodge who would never set foot over its threshold if they knew beforehand what is on the inside.

The grips, the pass-words, the mysterious raps and signs, the frosted windows, the curious emblems,—these make such an appeal to human curiosity that very many persons cannot resist it, but offer themselves as applicants for membership simply that they may know what all these mean, and become "wise" like those already "initiated". A young man of self-respect and intelligence ought to spurn from him with contempt a system which makes this appeal to his prurient curiosity rather than to his reason and intelligence; and it is a hopeful sign of the times that many young men are doing so. The other form of their appeal is to the love of pomp and display, which is almost as powerful a spring of activity as the other disposition just alluded to. Boys are set wild by the white aprons, the scarfs, the nodding crests, the gleaming swords, the music of the bands and the other things which go to make up the display of these orders. Many of the converts to Masonry and other like associations are made before the boys reach the age of 14, and they merely wait for the appointed age to come, to put into execution what the fascination of these displays has already created in their minds. Strip the more dangerous of the secret orders of their mystery and their pomp, and they could no longer get a single respectable member to join them.

There are many other objections to the secret-society system, from other points of view; but these, it seems to me, are sufficient to condemn it before the intelligence and the moral judgment of all right-minded, thinking men.

DANGER TO THE CHURCH AND FAMILY FROM THE LODGE.

ADDRESS OF MRS. A. J. GORDON, PRESIDENT OF THE BOSTON W. C. T. U., AT THE NEW ENGLAND
ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

I was asked to say a few words this evening, and I want to express my sympathy with the objects of this association, and also my gratitude at being allowed to speak on this occasion. It seems to me that often the favor is to the speaker, when one is asked to address a meeting on a certain subject, because it ensures that person making some investigation, at least, into that subject; and it secures, or ought to secure, a little more intelligence in regard to the matter under discussion than perhaps there would have been if the attention had not been called to it.

I was reading an account of a very wise colored brother who was mourning that there was not more light in the churches, and he said, "It is because, as the Lord said, my people don't consider." And he said: "A day's considerin' is worth a year's workin'," and I think that there is quite a germ of truth in that. If we could only stop and consider some of these things; could give our attention to them; could learn some of the facts, we should be able to form a more intelligent judgment about many questions concerning which we are now in the dark.

Many dear sisters say to me, if I speak to them on this subject: "Oh, I don't care to hear anything about it. My father was a Mason, and my husband was an Odd-fellow, and I cannot believe it is anything very bad, if they had anything to do with it; they were good and honest men, and good members of society, and they wouldn't have gone into anything that was harmful." And so, out of loyalty to the husband or father, they decline to listen to or to look into these matters. But it seems to me that the time has come when we must judge for ourselves. We cannot be saved by our father's piety, or our husband's religion; we must believe for ourselves. So we must form an intelligent individual judgment in regard to these subjects.

I find, also, that there is a great deal of sensitiveness among the men in regard to these matters of the secret societies, the Masons, or Odd-fellows, or whatever you please to call them. They are members, perhaps, brought into it when they were young men. They may never have been in a lodge-room since their marriage. They say that it is the rule for Masons not to attend the lodge after they get a wife; but, nevertheless, they have a kind of tenderness about it,—a sensitiveness in regard to it.

They say to me: "Now do not try to run too many reforms. You have done a good work in temperance; do you not see how it is getting on? Confine yourself to one thing; do not scatter your fire." So they try to discourage one from taking up any other line of reform,—any other interest.

I have been thinking a great deal of this subject since I was asked to speak a few words, and, instead of studying books, I have been studying people. I have always found my best arguments for temperance in that way,—in going around with a petition, and seeing what objections people made, and that would set me to thinking to find some answer to these objections. So I have been studying men and persons more than books, to arrange the thoughts of my address to you this evening, and I have said to some of them: "How did you happen to join this society? You don't care about it now; you do not attend the meetings. One would not know you were a member, if it did not come out accidentally?" And perhaps they say: "We were young men, and our room-mates were members, and they wanted us to join. They said it was a good thing, and was going to help us in business; the members would be interested for our promotion. There was a promise of help in case of accident or sickness, and they would befriend us if we were strangers in a strangeland. And then, besides, there was a curiosity to find out what were the wonderful secrets that could keep so many in fellowship together for so long. And so, although the women are charged with curiosity, we find it has often been the motive which has induced so many men to ally themselves with these organizations; and then, after they are in, they have a kind of pride in standing up for it and not acknowledging their folly.

But there is one thing that I do feel very decidedly, and that is that a Christian man, and especially a Christian minister, once having been brought into these organizations, and finding out the real and true character of them, ought not only to withdraw himself, but ought to warn young men from becoming connected with such associations. And how can a minister be a chaplain in one of these organizations, and offer up a perfunctory prayer to a supreme being, who may be Buddha, and may be Jupiter, or any other individual they may choose to mention. It is not in the name of Christ the prayer is offered, for I have read in some of their books that the name of Christ is not allowed to be brought in as a mediator; it might offend some infidel or some Jew, and they regard all religions alike. To them "initiation into the lodge takes the place of regeneration." That is exactly what I read.

To them the Koran, in Mohammedan countries, the sacred books of the Hindus in India, and the maxims of Confucius in China,—wherever there is a religious system—that system is just as binding, and just as much authoritative to the members as the Christian religion.

I know sometimes the Knights Templars go into a church, and the minister goes through a service, but that is not the service which they have in the lodge; and I cannot understand how a Christian minister can consent to be identified with such organizations.

I would not speak unkind words. I do not think we ever gain anything by talking to people in that spirit. We put them on their defence, while what we want is to win them to know that there is something better. No mother, and no teacher, thinks that the right way to train a child is to go and snatch a thing away from a child. I wouldn't snatch even a pair of scissors out of the fingers of a child; I would offer him an orange, or a spool of bright colored silk, and take his mind off on to something else. And so in trying to draw men away from the secret lodge, if we could only get them to come here and show them that we have something that is as good, and much better. And so in speaking here, I would not be understood to say anything in a bitter spirit, but it is all in a spirit of love. I long that they should have something so much better.

A young man, a Chinese brother, told me to-day that he used to belong to a secret society among the Chinese, but that he had not been there for four or five years,—not since he was converted; but he dropped in one day to have a few words with the teacher, or high priest, or leader, whatever he is called, and he was telling him that since he had got Christ, he did not want to come any more, and he was commending his Saviour as his best friend to this man. I asked him what they did there; and he said they teach them to be honest, and to do right, and not to fight,—good moral precepts, like the precepts of Confucius,—but they come out, and go right at it again. You may have the best kind of maxims in regard to morality, but if there is no Holy Spirit behind them to enable men to keep them, they are not kept. And so that is why we want them to come into the church of Christ, and know the power of Jesus in the heart to change the life. So this Chinese brother was telling about the Christ he had found, and he said he did not want to go to the lodge any more, because he had something so much better.

I know that the benevolent side of these orders attracts a great many; but if you read some of their books, you will see that the benevolence is selfish, after all. They don't take in the poor, needy and afflicted, to help and save. Among their rules is this: That no old person, and no young person,—that is, under age, and no defective person physically, and no idiot, and no woman, can be allowed to become a member of a lodge; that is, those most likely to become dependent and need the care and sympathy of the brotherhood, are forbidden by these rules to become members. Surely, if we want the benefit of life-insurance, we have all that in business-like corporations, if we didn't have it fifty or sixty or one hundred years ago; so that a man can provide for his family on a much better basis than by paying in such large amounts as they demand in these organizations, and then drawing out a mere stipend for the benefit of his family after his death.

I do regret that even the women have been brought into these things. I suppose they did it as a matter of self-defence; their husbands were off to their lodges, and they must come together and found some kind of a society, and so we have Odd-ladies. I am glad they are odd. I am glad it isn't a regular thing for women to be members of lodges. They are odd ladies. And the Daughters of Rebecca, and other societies, have their rituals; and go through their performances at funerals; all of which seems to me superfluous and contrary to Christ.

However, I don't wish to criticise. I only say I regret that they don't find something so much better.

I rejoice to be a member of an organization which is not secret; which wants everything it does and says free and open to everybody; which, if it finds a truth, wants it to be widespread, not only over the land, but over the world, and which is trying to spread the benefits of its beneficent influence around the world. I refer to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It is the only entirely un-secret temperance society, I think, that there is. The Good Templars and the Sons of Temperance thought they would add to their strength by having a password, and closed doors, and a key and a secret. But it is so puerile,—so childish; and when we become men we want to put away childish things. It is well enough in the infancy of a race, or in the infancy of a reform, to do things in this childish way, but for men to go about with regalia, with plumes and aprons, and buckles and buttons! Oh, as I see them parade through the streets, I think if vanity ever had a display, and foolishness a parade, that certainly these men, with their plumes and aprons, are having an opportunity to make themselves look ridiculous and silly. It is bad enough for a woman, and a silly girl at that, to be decked out with furbelows and feathers and furs, but when it comes to a big, strong man, who takes his regalia out of a box for a parade in the street, and goes all around the town with a plume, like a rooster with a big comb, it is so silly. It is time men put away such things.

And one of the worst features of it is the hold it has upon our young men in the colleges. There may have been a time when they were formed as purely literary associations, really for improvement, for developing their faculties, and assisting them so they could do their part in the work of life. But if all that is told is true, and we cannot doubt that it is, the majority of these societies are just hot-beds of sin, idleness, dissipation and voluptuous luxury. You see around the colleges those handsome buildings, those chapters houses where the light is shut out, and the young men go in there with their keys, and waste their substance in riotous living,—in drinking and smoking.

Then the risk to life which these initiation rites involve. How we were all saddened last spring, as we read of the terrible and sudden death of a young man in Yale College, who, as one of the initiating rites of a society which he was to join was blindfolded and sent out into the public streets to run headlong as fast as he could, only to run into the shaft of a wagon, and be pierced in his bowels, so that he died almost immediately. How my heart went out to the mother of the boy! I knew of her. She was a friend of a friend of mine, and it seemed to bring her near to me, as she received her boy, who had gone out in the hope and joy and flush of youth, brought home murdered by the folly and sin of these secret societies.

What was done about it? Nothing! The young men were sorry; they did not mean any harm! Why, the faculty of Yale University should have come together and said: "We will have no more of these things. We will have no more of such enormities practiced in this place."

Many, on good grounds, are afraid that such societies as these which we are criticising have done much to destroy the moral tone of this ancient university.

I am thankful to say that both of my sons have been through Harvard College, and neither of them ever had anything to do with any secret societies, and they have maintained that purity of heart for which I thank God.

In a rich and great university which has just been planted in Chicago, President Harper has said there should be no secret societies. They may have fraternities, literary associations, but they must be open; and if at any time there is any complaint, or cause for complaint, they shall be broken up. He is going to just overturn and uproot these nests of sin for young men, these hot-beds where young men are contaminated; and he is going, so far as he has any influence, to give a good, clean, pure, fair chance to the young men who come to study. I am sorry to say that his faculty did not all agree with him. They were contaminated with the Greek-letter Society idea but he has had his own way, and I thank the Lord it is so. I have not heard anything that has satisfied me so much as to have that college set the key-note to reform in that way; and we can point to one college, one institution, which is the pride of the West, and which in coming years will be more and more so, as setting its face like a flint against these societies. And so we may hope that other colleges will take the hint and improve it.

Now I have taken up quite a little time, and I only want to say further, that if any one does not know about these things now, it is his or her own fault. This organization has a literature,—I was reading over the list of books printed by them, and I thought I should like to read them all. They have on every line the finest collection, published by Ezra A. Cook, Chicago, Ill.

It seems to me that no one need be ignorant in regard to the oaths, the obligations, the penalties,—the blasphemies, which are proved of some of these Masonic regulations. I have in my hand "The Character, Claims, and Practical Workings of Freemasonry," by the Rev. Charles G. Finney. You all know who he is. They may say: "How are you to know these things? You have never been a member." Well, we read them, written by a man of irreproachable character, whose word could be taken—a man filled with the Holy Ghost. We can read it from men who have been once entangled in these things, but who, on conversion, saw that it was not the place for a Christian, and that their duty to God and to their fellow-men required that they should write the things which they knew. I want to recommend anyone who is at all in doubt about these things, to read these books, and I am sure it will take you a very little time to make up your mind what your duty is concerning them.

WAYSIDE NOTES.

FROM RECENT EXCHANGES.

The National Christian Association opposed to secret societies, has been pushing its noble work with even more than its wonted energy this season. A number of well-attended State conventions have been held East and West, and vigorous addresses have been delivered. The Christian Cynosure is filled every week with rousing reports from all the fields of conflict, in all of which active secretaries are doing splendid work. The Cynosure is a worthy organ of the great cause of anti-secrecy. What it is to that patriotic and Christian movement there ought to be also to the cause of national reform. The Cynosure is the right arm of the movement against the empire of darkness. May there soon be as vigorous an arm, striking as frequent and as effective blows in that most comprehensive of all reform movements, the reformation of the nation and its government by the practical acknowledgment of the law and authority of Jesus Christ as King.—Political Dissenter, Pittsburgh.

A leading Masonic paper has published what purports to be a Bull of Pope Leo XIII., under date of Dec. 25, 1891. This document has been widely copied and circulated as authentic; but it is a miserable Masonic forgery. Secretism can never deliver America from the curse of Romanism. Something more radical is needed than the dissemination of a clumsy imitation of a papal encyclical. The setting forth of truth in the full noonday light, and the breaking down of all chambers of darkness, is essential to deliverance from the spiritual tyranny of Rome. Masonry cannot apply the cure. The Lord may dash these systems together like potsherds, and make them serve the purpose of each other's destruction.—Political Dissenter.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

A few remarks on Christmas—The recount in Boston—Catholicism in New England—The Yale riot—Testimony from an unexpected source—A Chinese Masonic temple in Boston.

Perhaps it is not too late for a few observations on Christmas, as the traditional "twelve days" are not yet over. One of the most unpleasant things to note was the appalling number of victims to Boston's licensed saloons which the police courts report. If she would only celebrate the so-called anniversary of our Saviour's birth by shutting up these gates of hell, it would be one method of doing honor to the day which the strictest Puritan of us all would not quarrel with. While Christmas was never more universally regarded, I have also noticed a much stronger undercurrent of protest, which betokens a healthy reaction against its absurdities and follies, at least, if nothing more. When it first took its place in the list of holidays, most New England people looked upon it as a pleasant Old World custom, and gave very little thought to any other aspect of the question, though the well-informed knew that it could not possibly be the real anniversary of our Saviour's birth. It is rather singular that as the Christians of the third century met heathenism half-way, so the children of the Puritans are now meeting Rome half-way, and with probably as little idea of the consequence. Chapter 3 in Hislop's wonderful work on "The Two Babylons," shows clearly enough what any religious encyclopedia would tell us, though without the same fullness of detail, that Christmas and Easter are both heathen in their origin, and, however baptized as church days, with Rome for their sponsor, are by no means purged of the old leaven.

The observance of such days in New England has a significance which it cannot have in Great Britain or Germany, where the custom is deeply rooted as a part of the national religion. Here it is a fashion, an imported thing, which makes a great difference to start with. Not being indigenous to the soil, it is not as likely to be observed in a healthy, natural manner, and indeed it fares with us much as our own Thanksgiving-day might if transplanted among a people who had no historic memories or sacred associations clustering around it to sound the key-note of its true observance. In the old countries the keeping of Christmas or Easter does not mean any advance Romeward. Here, in the land of Puritan traditions, it does. It is a part of that movement which is sweeping even our Congregational churches into ritualism and formality. A Connecticut Congregational pastor is reported as saying, in a recent sermon, that "when he went by those grand edifices, the Catholic churches, he did not feel as if they were the Scarlet Woman or anti-Christ, but he felt like taking off his hat. It had brought out all the great scholars of Rome and Greece. It was a grand, inspiring religion," etc. Doesn't every one who has studied the history of the Protestant Reformation know that Rome fought most bitterly the revival of classic learning during the Middle Ages, almost as bitterly as she fights our free schools to-day? And why hasn't this "grand and inspiring religion" inspired her rum-selling, prize-fighting members to quit their disgraceful professions? Why hasn't it inspired them to rise above the filth, and rags, and illiteracy which predominate in every country to-day where she has the rule? God deliver us from such foolish shepherds, and raise up such as will stand for the pure faith of our fathers against the tide which is sweeping us Romeward!

The recount in Boston on the license vote made no material change in the result, but the liquor interest was powerful enough to lead the Board of Aldermen to refuse the petitioners their right to witness the recount. This surely looks like an attempt to cover up something, and gives to the worst suspicions of fraud at the ballot-box the color of truth. Of the large sums of money expended to secure license at the late city election, O'Donnel, the head of the labor union which asked for the recount, is reported as saying, that the brewer who paid the largest share of the expenses, "and who is fraternally known to certain aldermen and members of the Legislature, made no return." Occasionally one catches a glimpse of the hidden hand of Masonry manipulating the wires.

It is a singular fact that no-license made some of its greatest gains in the poorest wards of the city, where the Democracy rules supreme, while on the aristocratic Back Bay the Yes vote was the largest. It is a pity that the working people who cast their ballots against the saloon must submit to have it planted in their midst, and more than a pity that a law could not be passed locating it where it legitimately belongs. This would give the churches that are one by one leaving the South End for this more fashionable district some missionary work to do. It may sound wicked, but one is tempted to query whether the South End would not gain more by a wholesale migration of the saloon than they will lose by the removal of these "candlesticks" which seem to have forgotten the chief end of their being—to let their light shine where God has planted them. This huddling together of the churches in one favored locality, while giving up another to the unrestrained domination of the saloon, is consummately bad generalship; and if the prince of evil laughs in his sleeve to see the opposing side thus play into his hands, who can wonder?

A statue of the Virgin Mary was recently dedicated with imposing ceremonies at St. Joseph's Cathedral, Hartford. A Dominican priest preached the sermon for the occasion, which was on the immaculate conception; and then the bishop performed what seemed the rather superfluous ceremony of blessing the statue, as if the Virgin was not equal to blessing her own statue! I noticed, in a recent issue of the Springfield Republican, widely known as one of the oldest and most reliable newspapers published in New England, a story, taken from the Catholic Review, the plot of which hinged on the conversion of a young Protestant woman to Rome through the influence of her Catholic lover. It took up several columns, and with its mingling of sentiment and pseudo devotion was exactly fitted to impress young and plastic minds. Is there a Jesuit on the staff of the Springfield Republican? It looks like it. Prof. Townsend's warning at the Methodist Ministers' meeting was not the cry of an alarmist or an agitator, but the calm utterance of a cool, level brain. He is a man that Rome has reason to fear. The very fact that he is by nature slow and cautious makes his onslaughts on iniquity, whether in the church of the Wesleys or she who sits on the Tiber, something tremendous.

Judge Pickett has made a very sensible ruling in the case of the Yale students whose outrageous behaviour was chronicled by the press some weeks ago;—which is, that the disturbance in question was a riot, and the participants therein should be treated as rioters. The fact that they were college-bred youths only enhances the scandal of their conduct, and it is high time that the law made an example of such offenders. How much do their secret societies have to do in fostering this lawless spirit and contempt of authority? A peculiar illustration of the immoral tendency of these college secret clubs is shown in the case of Harvard's Professor of Moral Philosophy, who nearly a quarter of a century ago belonged to one and was its secretary. Probably, when under the convivial influence of those associations, he produced some objectionable verses which were copied on to the society's books, and now, after so long a time, have risen up to undermine his influence and be thorns in his side—a warning against this hidden danger from an unexpected source. Doubtless the Professor would give much to-day could he have been warned by some judicious friend, and been sensible enough to heed the counsel, and so avoid all this chagrin and mortification.

The Chinese Freemasons of Boston have now a temple of their own, situated in Mt. Hope Cemetery. It was recently dedicated by Grand Master Gong Hoar, of the Chinese Masonic order, with ceremonies which were, after all, not much more heathenish than those used by their American brethren on similar occasions. It is not pleasant to think of these Chinese Highbinder societies in the city of the Pilgrims. One reads with a curious feeling, that in the rear of the "temple" are furnaces "to receive offerings made to the gods in memory of dead Chinamen." But there is no use in being squeamish when pagan worshipers are legalized in every chartered Masonic lodge in the land.

THE MASONIC "GRAND LODGE ABOVE".

BY WILLIAM ADAMS.

"The lodge above"—"Grand lodge above"—
The acme of Masonic love,
For faithful Masons when they die—
"Dear brothers of the mystic tie!"

No woman ever enters there,
Nor children can its glories share;
No fools or cripples ever come
Within the confines of that home.
The Tyler, stationed at the door,
Guards, with a sword, the sacred floor
Where the "Great Architect" presides,
And all the craft in wisdom guides.

A brother from the lodge below
Comes up, as all good brothers do;
And thus the bright and happy throng
Greet the newcomer with a song:

"Glad welcome to our higher sphere,
Our precious, faithful brother dear;
But if you tell our doings here,
We'll cut your throat from ear to ear:
Take out your heart and hang it up
Upon the temple's tipmost top;
Take out your bowels, too, and burn them,
And into dust and ashes turn them;
And then, if you will not go dead,
We'll knock the top off from your head.
This is our bond of union, brother;
Our principles admit no other.
They're just the same, you ought to know,
As those we acted on below.

"Come now, dear brother, and refresh;
Here's brandy, cabbage, fish and flesh,
And everything that you can think
That's good to eat, or good to drink;
But stay, dear brother; let us know,
Are all your dues paid up below?
And have you never told the truth
You promised to conceal, forsooth?
And have you always helped a brother
In everything against all other?
These are the only questions here,
And these well-answered, all is clear.

"The Junior Warden, over there,
Will watch you with fraternal care,
And see that you don't take too much Of this and that, and such and such,
Lest they should cause you to forget
And talk of things you will regret.

"Some of us won't forget it soon:
Good times we had in your saloon,
And how we used to scoop the greenies,
And share the perquisites between us!
You used to drink too freely then—
We hope you won't do that again.

"And now go down and see your mother
In hades, and your crippled brother,
Your wife and daughter, sister, too,
And aunts and cousins not a few.
How gladly they will welcome you!
You know we can't let them come here—
The rule seems almost too severe;
But then, dear brother, you must know
That such a thing would never do.
If you find anything right good,
Pray, bring it for the brotherhood.
We can appreciate them here;
They undervalue them down there.

"Stay just as long as you see fit:
The pass-word always will admit;
The Tyler, always at the door,
Let's all the craft in, and no more.
Some of our churchly brothers go,
And stay down there a week or so;
And sing the songs they used to sing
Of praise to Christ, the Saviour King.
Such songs are not permitted here,
Lest they offend some brethren dear."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 4, 1893.

It is not given to everybody to appreciate the truthfulness of the Scriptural injunction: "It is better to give than to receive," in its full meaning, but the congregation of one Washington church—Calvary Baptist—gave indisputable evidence, last Sunday, that they did, by raising the largest sum of money ever raised at a single meeting of any Washington congregation. This church, which has the largest Sunday-school in Washington, nearly half of its scholars being adults, and probably the largest in this section of the United States, has outgrown its present edifice, one of the handsomest in the city, and a committee was recently appointed to devise means for increasing its accommodations, and also for building a new chapel for one of its branch missions and aiding another to build. This committee decided upon a plan which involved the expenditure of $140,000. This was a large sum, but Dr. Greene, the pastor, was not discouraged. He sent letters to all of his congregation requesting them to attend the meeting last Sunday. At that meeting, after stating in detail what the money was wanted for, he said that a member of his congregation had offered to contribute an equal amount to that contributed by the rest of the congregation. Then the contributions began to pour in, starting with several of $5,000 each, and in less than an hour they footed up $70,000, which was then duplicated by Mr. S. W. Woodward, a Washington merchant, making a total of $140,000, the amount required. This remarkable meeting marked an era in Washington church history, and members of all denominations join with the Baptists in rejoicing at its result. The example set by the liberality of this congregation cannot fail to have a good effect upon every congregation in Washington, and, indeed, its effect will probably be felt in many churches remote from the national capital.

Reforms move slowly, but as long as they move forward at all there is hope for final victory. For many years the efforts of hundreds of good men and women have been directed towards the abolition of intoxicating liquors at the New Year's reception, which are such a prominent feature of social life in this city, and, although success has not yet been achieved, the result is encouraging. Every year the number of houses at which wine is served to callers is fewer than the year before, and this year the change is said to be more marked than ever before, which encourages those who are striving to have this great temptation to the young men removed to hope that the time is not far distant when young ladies will consider it a disgrace to offer their gentlemen callers intoxicating liquor.

Madame Tel Sono, the Japanese lady who has been making a tour of this country, raising what she calls "Jesus money" for the support of the religious school for high-caste Japanese girls, which she hopes to have in operation in her own country before the expiration of the present year, bade her Washington friends farewell to-day, when she left for New York, whence she will sail for England on the 18th inst. After a short stay in England, she will return to Japan and begin what she has mapped out for her life-work.

Your correspondent asked one of the most prominent ministers of the city what he considered most notable in the history of the local churches for the year just passed. He replied, without a moment's hesitation: "The remarkable increase in the attendance of young men at all of our churches;" and when asked to what he attributed this increase, he answered: "To the interest in the church which has been fostered and developed by the numerous organizations composed of young men which have become such a popular feature in most of our churches. These organizations cannot, in my opinion, be too highly praised for the good work they are doing; they make the young men who join them feel as though they had a proprietary interest in the church, and thus touch one of the great underlying principles of human nature; for of what a man owns a part, he is certain to be interested in promoting its welfare." There is no question about the popularity of these organizations, one or more of which have been established in nearly all if not in every church in the city; nor is there any question about the largely increased attendance of young men at all of our churches. Comments are heard upon it on all sides, and many a mother who had grave fears for the future of her boy now rejoices to see him regularly going to church and displaying an eager interest in some branch of church-work.

Congress reassembled after its two weeks' recess to-day, but the attendance was very small in both House and Senate. The number of members slightly indisposed is large.

Much interest is felt in President Harrison's forthcoming special message to Congress, concerning the Canadian Pacific railroad and the privileges it enjoys by grace of this government. There is a hostile feeling in Congress towards this corporation.

REFORM NEWS.

ELGIN AND EVANSTON.

INTERESTING MEETINGS IN INTERESTING PLACES.

The last Sabbath of the old year was spent in the beautiful city of Elgin, crowning the hills on either side the Fox river.

The immense watch factory, employing some 3,500 persons, has taken the name of the city around the world. The market here gives the price of butter to the nation, and the factories for condensed milk, cheese and other dairy products are extensive enough to make many a city celebrated. The first State Sabbath organization was formed here a few years ago, Pres. C. A. Blanchard being the leader in that noble movement.

The prohibitory sentiment is strong; the saloons are not prominent, audacious and numerous as in many towns of this size; and the people are generally church-goers. Still the stifling influence of the lodge is felt in many of the churches and shows that there is need of the revival of pure and undefiled religion.

Rev. P. Thelander, the young and warm-hearted pastor of the Swedish Lutheran church, invited me sometime since to come and speak to his people, but as the fall conference meetings occupied my time, his people asked him to speak himself, which he did faithfully and to a full house.

The Free Methodist brethren have a commodious brick house, where several of our reform meetings have been held—a State convention a few years ago, made notable by the Students' Contest. Bro. I. R. B. Arnold also spoke to a crowded house during the fall meeting of the Illinois Free Methodist conference. Bro. C. S. Gitchell is now the pastor. Arranging with Bro. Sears, a "pillar" in the church and community, I spoke on the Sabbath named, both morning and evening. The cold was intense and the audiences affected by it, but I trust the word was not spoken in vain. Personally I enjoyed meeting with this earnest people, and felt drawn towards them and was refreshed by the spirit in their simple and earnest services. Bro. Gitchell will take and forward subscriptions for the Cynosure.

During the succeeding week good progress was made toward a representation of our reform among the congresses of the World's Fair; but that may not be the Lord's way for the proclamation of the truth against the paganism of the lodge. We may have to testify "without the gate," as Moody and Sankey are preparing to do.

The union meeting of the Scandinavian churches of Evanston, suggested by pastor Edgren of the Swedish Lutheran church, and for which preparation was nearly complete two weeks before, was held in Union Hall on Sabbath afternoon, New Year's day. The hall was full and the meeting a success. The hall is occupied every Sabbath at three by the W. C. T. U., which, under the magic influence of Miss Willard, holds Evanston as one of its centers of power. The city enjoys prohibition under the State law chartering Northwestern University, which forbids the sale of liquor within an area of four miles from the institution. The ladies dropped their meeting and gave the use of the hall, as they had long wished a meeting of these same churches for temperance. So the two issues were joined. Bro. A. W. Parry, of the Free Methodist church, foremost in Christian reform work, made the final arrangements and published so good a program that the local press declared it "excellent." The addresses in Scandinavian were to be by Rev. R. Cederberg, of the Swedish M. E. church, on temperance; by Rev. H. Bergh, Norwegian M. E., on Sabbath reform; and in English by the N. C. A. secretary on the lodge. Rev. Chas. Palm of the Swedish Baptist, and Rev. A. Edgren also were to assist. Brethren Bergh, Edgren and Hagfeldt of the Mission church were not with us: the first from painful illness, the others because of urgent duties which took them from the city. Resolutions were adopted protesting against a Sabbath-breaking World's Fair, and the collection was divided between the W. C. T. U. and our association.

I had the privilege of attending watch meeting with Bro. Parry's people Saturday night, and speaking to them from the Word next morning. These services began a series of meetings in which they were to be aided by Miss Knecht, an evangelist whom God has used in blessing other churches. God was present through the day reviving his people, and we may expect to hear of many turning from the world to God.

FROM THE WESTERN DISTRICT.

OAKLAND, Kans., Jan. 5, 1883.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am not lecturing this week. I did not try to make any appointments, because it is the week of prayer.

Last week I spent five days doing some interesting work in Johnson county, Kan. I stopped with Mr. R. N. Redpath, of Morse, the most of the time I was in the county. Mr. R. does not conceal his convictions in his coat-sleeve. I was very hospitably entertained and helped in my work. Mr. R. had arranged three lectures for me—one at Stanley and two at Morse.

The meeting at Stanley was given up because of too much interest and attractions in other directions. I hope to give an address in Stanley at a future time. Everything runs to Odd-fellowship and the Grange in and about Stanley.

I filled the two appointments at Morse. The audiences were fair though the evenings were cold. The first evening I gave an address on "The Religious Claims of Freemasonry," and on the second evening on "The Secret Lodge System." At the conclusion of the first address, an old gentleman came forward and asked me some questions and pronounced some dictums. He asked me something about whether all Masons were going to hell, or whether there were any Christian Masons. He remarked that he was both a Mason and a Christian. We must answer men who come forward with this question, that that is a matter for them to consider and to decide. It is a species of "bluff," and an endeavor to bring out harsh statements. It is not necessary to use harsh statements in reply, but simply hand the question back. We present the stern facts; let them answer such questions.

This gentleman asserted that I got all my information from Wm. Morgan. I called his attention to the fact that I had quoted from Masons Mackey, Sickels, Pierson, etc. Did he not know these men? No; he did not know them. To my earnest and repeated inquiry as to what Masonic books he had read he gave no reply.

He then asked me if I were a Mason. I replied by asking him what difference it made whether I were a Mason or not. His reply was startling, "If I were a Mason I would know and some of these were likely true; if I were not a Mason, they were not true!" Here we have a new and marvelous test of truth. As to whether a thing be true or false depends not on its inherent nature, but upon certain factitious assertions sus-

CORRESPONDENCE.

FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

WAUPACA, Wis., —, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—That the people of the United States, and especially in our large cities, have suffered from the vast influx of Europeans, many of whom were from the lowest strata of society, is quite evident. That some plan should be devised to protect us from the importation of the vicious and merely pauper classes may well be conceded; but when it comes to specific measures there is room for much discussion. I notice, with regret, the proposal to admit to our ports, during the coming year, only those who come as cabin passengers in the great steamships, and that this will meet the concurrence of the steamship companies. Against such a course I most earnestly protest, for the following reasons.

1. It would admit the rich, regardless of personal character, though they were notorious gamblers and swindlers, and exclude the virtuous poor simply because they are poor. No class of our people have done more to develop our resources as a nation than our German and Scandinavian immigrants, most of whom came here in poverty.

2. It would be a violation of international comity. We claim and exercise the right to visit the Old World. We look to its governments for the protection of our citizens. We have not hesitated to demand such protection, and have sent a part of our fleet to enforce such demands. We have always succeeded in securing such protection. It will be with a bad grace that we say to European nations, "We insist that you shall receive and protect our citizens, but we will exclude yours, unless they are rich."

3. It would violate the principle of natural justice. Every self-supporting and law-abiding person has a natural right to visit any portion of God's earth, and remain there. He has a natural right to labor and seek employment as truly in America as in Europe. The same principle of natural justice on which we claimed our right to natural existence, and which is set forth in the Declaration of Independence, binds us to accord to all men the right to reside where they will and to seek for happiness as they will, provided they do no wrong to their fellow-men.

4. It is a violation of the law of love: "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them."

This is not only a law for individuals, but for nations and governments. Our Saviour has told us that our neighbor, whom we are to love as ourselves, is not simply one of our own race and nation, but includes all mankind. So long as the poor of Europe or of China can better their condition by coming here (unless they are vicious), we ought to make them welcome and share with them the burdens of life. This is the demand of the law of love. Let not the Christian Cynosure discard it. H. H. HINMAN.

BEGGING CHURCH FUNDS FROM SALOON-KEEPERS.

CHICAGO, January 4, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I was much interested in your correspondent's account, in the Cynosure for December 29, of the performance of Dr. Duncan McGregor, the prominent Masonic Baptist preacher. In a fresh number of the Philadelphia Christian Instructor, I find another incident concerning him that is equally discreditable to his Christian walk and conversation.

A fair was recently held for the benefit of the building fund of his church, and in order to increase the receipts a circular was prepared for distribution among persons outside of his congregation. By the advice of a Masonic brother, the names of a number of prominent citizens were appended to the circular, with the understanding that they should be seen in reference to the matter before the circular was sent out. By some oversight the "seeing" was not done, and several of those whose names were attached to the document very properly resented the implication that they had either signed it themselves or had authorized any one else to do so.

Among others to whom this circular was sent were some saloon-keepers, whose money was deemed as good as anybody's for church-building purposes. We are informed that Dr. McGregor apologized for surreptitiously using the signatures of well-known citizens, but made no excuse for soliciting donations from liquor-sellers. The Christian Instructor says that "the matter is at best a disgrace to the congregation, and a dishonor to religion." It does look that way.

MAT. HAWTHORN.

"THE ANTIQUITY OF FREEMASONRY."

CHICAGO, Jan. 3, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Probably you will think that this subject has grown too "flat, stale and unprofitable" to be revived at this late date, since the Masons themselves have ransacked every known record for evidence that their fraternity is as old as creation—indeed, some of them claim that it existed before the world was made.

But if new evidence can be deduced to prove that Freemasonry was an antediluvian institution—evidence that can be relied upon—we ought to become sufficiently interested—yea, honest enough—to listen and learn how ancient are these sacred mysteries.

I have before me a copy of the Deseret Weekly News, printed at Salt Lake City, Utah, and bearing date Dec. 31, 1892—a paper that fully supports the doctrines and interests of the Mormon church as originated by Joseph Smith, the seer, and established by Brigham Young and his satellites in that Territory.

In it I find the following, which purports to be an extract from a work entitled, "The Prehistoric History of America," and which gives an account of an ancient race called Chichimecs, who were contemporary with the Toltecs. "Rude as they were, the Chichimecs had a religion. They adored the sun as the supreme god, and they also worshiped lightning, represented by the god Nixcoatl (the Serpent of the clouds), who, like the antique Jupiter, was figured with thunderbolts in his hands. . . . In war they were extremely ferocious and cruel. They put their prisoners to the most horrible torture; they made a practice of drinking the blood of their victims."

Upon this the Deseret News freely comments as follows: "The religion of the most ancient Eastern nations comprised in its systems not only idolatry, but secret works of darkness, and of murders, and other abominations. These secret combinations were had among the antediluvians, and revived among the descendants of Noah soon after the flood. In the very nature of the case no record would be kept of the workings of this satanic order by the members thereof. An account of its origin was revealed to Joseph the seer in 1830.

"It was concocted through a wicked compact between Satan and Cain. Cain loved Satan more than God. It was by the command of Satan that Cain made an offering unto the Lord of the fruits of the field.

"And Satan said unto Cain, 'Swear unto me by thy throat, and if thou tell it, thou shalt die; and swear thy brethren by their heads, and by the living God, that they tell it not; for if they tell it, they shall surely die; and this that thy father may not know it; and this day I will deliver thy brother Abel into thy hands.' And Satan swore unto Cain that he would do according to his commands. And all these things were done in secret. And Cain saith, truly I am Mahan, the master of this great secret, that I may murder and get gain. Wherefore Cain was called Master Mahan, and he gloried in his wickedness."

"Lamech, the son of Methusael, was one who was caught in this artful snare. See Gen. 4. He slew Irad, the son of Enoch (son of Cain), and probably a young man also. Lamech had two wives, and he said unto his wives, 'I have slain a man to my wounding and a young man to my hurt,' thus revealing to them the sworn secret of the order. He slew Irad because he had learned the secret, and told it to some of the sons of Adam. 'Wherefore Lamech being angry, slew him, not like unto Cain his brother Abel, for the sake of getting gain, but he slew him for his oath's sake.'—Pearl of Great Price, p. 12.

"These oaths, murders, and secret combinations were known to the Babel builders, and were interwoven with their religious sacrifices, temple and tower building. And it was the grand inspiration to the gigantic scheme to lay claims to the entire earth, to own, rule and govern it, by having a central temple and a mighty metropolis as the grand seat of government and religion."

I leave the reader to form his own opinions, from this authority, as to the intimate connection between modern Masonry and this ancient fraternity, of which Satan was the Grand Master and Cain the Master Mahan (Mason?), and who swore by their throats to keep their deadly secrets. CARL BECKER.

LITERATURE.

The January Century has many attractive features, principal among which are Mark Twain's funny story of The £1,000,000 Note; A Winter Ride to the Great Wall of China, by N. B. Dennys; Whittier, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, with a full-page portrait; The Kindergarten Movement, by Talcott Williams; The Story of Millet's Early Life, by his younger brother; An Illustrator of Dickens (Hablot K. Browne), with reproductions of his art; Letters of Two Brothers (General and Senator Sherman); Notable Women—Dorothea Dix. Other art cles and contributors are as follows: La Grande Demoselle—A Balcony Story, by Grace King, illustrated; The Great Wall of China, by Romyn Hitchcock, illustrated; The Lights of London, by Louise I. Guiney; The Reward of the Unrighteous, by Geo. G. Bain, illustrated; "Crusty Christopher" (North—John Wilson), by Henry A. Beers, with a portrait; The Cosmopolis City Club (first paper), by Washington Gladden; Personal Studies of Indian Life—Politics and Pipe-Dancing, illustrated, by Alice D. Fletcher, etc. New installments of Walter Balesier's Benefits Forgotten, and Mrs. Burton Harrison's Sweet Bells Out of Tune are printed, with poems, and the usual editorial departments, as usual, ably filled. New York: The Century Co.

The Cosmopolitan for January is not a whit inferior to any of its contemporaries, either in letter-press or illustration, and is a splendid specimen of magazine-building, a subject that is admirably demonstrated in its own growth and prosperity, as set forth in its opening article. The other contents are varied, and several of them possess unusual literary and pictorial interest. Among them may be mentioned: Four Famous Artists, by Gerald Campbell; Japan Revisited, by Sir Edwin Arnold; Beauties (Female) of the American Stage, by Jos. P. Read and Wm. S. Walsh; The Confessions of an Autograph Hunter, by Chas. Robinson; The English Laureates (with portraits), by R. H. Stoddard; The Muses of Manhattan (with portraits), by Brander Matthews; Grant Under Fire, by Theodore R. Davis; A Traveler from Altruria, by W. D. Howells; The Wheel of Time, by Henry James; To Those Coming, by Edith M. Thomas; Co-operative Industry, by Edw'd E. Hale, and The Lost Island, by Louise V. Sheldon and E. J. Austin. Published in New York City.

The special features of the Review of Reviews for January are: 1st, a sketch of President Diaz of Mexico, his people and his country, written since his inauguration, Dec. 1st; 2nd, the experience of a young woman from this country in the Pasteur Hospital at Paris, who tried the effect of vaccination against cholera; and 3d, what has been accomplished in a year in University Extension. The monthly resume of magazine literature is still the valuable feature of the Review. We regret to note again some lapses in religious criticism, which though inconsiderable are yet pronounced. The troubles of the Presbyterian church, Briggs and Smith, are endorsed; a good word is given to the effort to make the theater a handmaid of the church and the Christian home; and the late movements of Romanism in America are accepted as glibly as if the Jesuits were not in full control of the machinery of that system. We cannot accept as true liberalism such views of great facts and movements as are had through half-closed eyes.

The January issue of the Cottage Hearth appears as a "holiday number," and a very creditable one, as a glance at its contents will attest: A full-page frontispiece, "Winter," is finely drawn and appropriate. Our New Navy, by Lieut. Wm. L. Rodgers, U. S. N., with six capital illustrations; Erastus Faulkner, by Matt. Crim, an illustrated story; The Story of a Burglary, by A. G. Kolbe; Hannah Dustin, a dramatic sketch, illustrated, by Oscar F. Adams; A Battle for Life, by Jerold Dean; How to Be the Wife of a Rich Man, by Julius Robinson; The Railway Cut, illustrated, by Wm. O. Stoddard; Skate Sailing, illustrated, by Edw. T. Thayer; with several poems, and the several domestic departments are filled with interesting briefs. Published by W. A. Wilde & Co., 25 Bromfield St., Boston.

The Journal of Hygiene and Herald of Health (formerly the Herald of Health) makes its appearance with its new name and other improvements. The editor, Dr. M. L. Holbrook, contributes a second paper on the Hygienic Treatment of Indigestion, and new Notes Concerning Health. Other articles and writers are as follows: Street-cleaning in Berlin, by Ethel Paton; Healing by Music, J. Jay Watson; and Hygiene for Women, by Jennie Chandler; A Song, by Mary Morgan, translated from the Italian, with Topics of the Month, Book Notices, etc. Published by M. L. Holbrook, 46 East 21st St., New York City.

Bible-readers will find the new monthly journal, The Defence ("set for the defence of the Gospel"), conducted by Evangelist Geo. C. Needham, assisted by a corps of other well-known students, a most acceptable visitor. Prof. W. G. Moorhead treats of Prophetic Landmarks; Dr. W. J. Erdman, of Critical Interpretation; Prof. J. M. Stifler, of Doctrinal Sketches; Geo. C. Needham, of Typical Teachings; Mrs. Geo. C. Needham, of Helps for Hard Places; Pastor A. C. Dixon, of Points for Preachers; Pastor D. M. Stearns, of Kingdom Tidings, etc. Published by Albert Needham, 1330 Arch St., Philadelphia.

Historia, the Chicago illustrated magazine of historical stories, has in its January number the following papers: The Pyramids of Ghizeh; How Two Union Generals were Captured; Story of the Well-beloved Madman; Death of Patroclus; Fall of Herbert and Danton; Morgan's Great Raid; Fighting the Mexicans (continued), and Questions Answered. Published by the Historia Company, Chicago.

Few ornaments for a home are more instructive and beautiful than a copy of the great Muncakzy painting, "Christ before Pilate". There have been many reproductions of this marvelous work of art, but none surpass the picture issued by the Illustrated Christian Weekly of New York, which represents feature and color with surprising likeness.

The Sanitary Era for December is a valuable installment of one of the very best hygienic periodicals extant. Its articles are brief, pointed and suggestive, and too numerous to mention even by their titles. Published in New York City for $1 a year.

LODGE NOTES.

(From Secret Society Journals.)

It is reported that a G. A. R. Post in Chicago is composed entirely of Knights Templar. The report needs confirmation.

A new commandery has been organized in Chicago, to be known as Columbia, and begins its existence under favorable circumstances.

M. W. Bro. Thomas J. Shryock, Grand Master of Maryland, has decided that a non-affiliated Mason cannot bring charges against an affiliate.

Estimated number of members, Nov. 30, 1892, 136,180; number of subordinate councils, 1,484; number of grand councils, 20.—Royal Arcanum.

Never speak of lodge matters in unseemly or improper places, as oftentimes there are eavesdroppers around, who should know nothing of such subjects.

The Masonic lodges in New Zealand, working under the various jurisdictions, are: New Zealand, 82; England, 40; Scotland, 20; Ireland, 5. Thus the total number of active and regular lodges in the colony is 147.

"Masonry is not a benefit society. It only relieves where charity is needed [paid for]. Some people hold the belief that they have but to ask and receive." "What fools these mortals be!" to expect something for nothing from a Masonic lodge.

It is said that some years ago the worshipful master of a lodge in the South Island, New Zealand, informed the deputy grand master that he intended initiating a Chinaman; but when it came to the point the celestial declined to take an obligation, and preferred blowing out a lighted candle, and his admission was not allowed.

The Catholic congregations at Pressburg, Hungary, adopted a resolution expelling all members who are Freemasons, and prohibiting and excluding all Freemasons from their organization. An appeal was taken from their decision to the Cardinal Prince, Primas Simor; and this highest clerical authority in Hungary sustained the appeal and invalidated the measure.

A New York contemporary has noticed in Masonic papers recently a discussion on "How should a Mason wear his apron?" The writers have spoken of the flap and the corner, the first, second and third degrees, but have forgotten the one word, more important than any other, and that one word covers the whole duty of a man and Mason. He should wear his apron worthily.—Mallet.

"Resolved, That the Grand Encampment approves and gives its sanction to the observance of Christmas day by Knights Templar, either in their official capacity or as commanderies, and that annually there be a Christmas toast and response prepared and transmitted to all grand commanderies and constituent commanderies owing allegiance to the Grand Encampment."—Masonic Chronicle.

At the recent semi-annual meeting of Medinah Temple (A. A. Order of the Mystic Shrine), Chicago, the degree was conferred upon ninety-six candidates. Notwithstanding the number, the work was most impressively performed. The paraphernalia of Medinah Temple is most elaborate and expensive, and lends decided effect in working the degree. The robes of the officers of Medinah cost over $5,000. After the evening's work there was a banquet, at which there were four hundred and ninety-six nobles seated. The visitors occupied the posts of honor.

The Home Journal has several times alluded to a movement among members of the Scottish Rite bodies of the United States for a union of the Southern and Northern Supreme Councils, and also for the abolition of life tenure of office. Among the warm advocates of these reforms is our distinguished brother, T. S. Parvin, of Iowa. At the recent meeting at Washington he presented a paper, which gives in detail the changes which he and many other members of the rite

It's a plan that proves something—but only the makers of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery adopt it. It's a plan to give you what you expect, or take no pay.

If, in any case, their remedy fails to benefit or cure you, they'll return the money.

That proves, for one thing, that it's pretty sure to do all that's claimed for it. And what they claim is, that all diseases or disorders caused by a torpid liver or impure blood are cured by it. For all the many forms of Scrofula, and for the most obstinate Skin and Scalp Diseases, Salt-rheum, Tetter, Eczema, Erysipelas, and all kindred ailments, it is an unequalled and unfailing remedy.

It proves that the "Discovery" is the best blood-medicine, or it couldn't be sold on such terms; and the cheapest, for you pay only for the good you get.

And it proves, too, that nothing else, offered in its place by the dealer, can be "just as good."

Beware of spurious imitations or dilutions, at lower prices.

believe desirable. . . . The reforms advocated by Bro. Parvin appear to be well worthy of consideration, and we cheerfully publish them for the information of all interested in that rite. There is no question that members of other rites are more or less prejudiced against the Scottish rite, on account of life tenure of office, which they regard out of harmony with the spirit of the age and with American institutions. This, however, is a matter of which Scottish Rite Masons are quite competent to judge for themselves.—Masonic Home Journal.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1893.

"I do renounce and disown any allegiance as due to any heretical king, prince, or state, named Protestant, or obedience to any of their inferior magistrates or officers."—Oath of the secret, intriguing order of the Society of Jesus in the United States.

TEMPERANCE WITHOUT SECRECY.

A significant movement in temperance work is represented by the National Templar Blade (Lansdowne, Pa.), organ of the Templars of Temperance, "a non-secret, non-partisan, non-sectarian and international union," founded ten years ago and now numbering 30,000 members. The notable feature of this organization is explained to the Cynosure readers in the following paragraph from the Blade:

"Our Union is non-secret, because many persons are conscientiously opposed to secret societies, and others are prejudiced or try to make secrecy an excuse for non-participation. This does not prevent the holding of private meetings, when and wherever desired, same as by ministerial bodies or by leaders in churches. The difference between private and secret meetings is that in the former case no member is pledged 'not to reveal any of the private work or business,' which secrecy pledge is usually found in the rituals of every secret order, and is, after all, of less importance either way than supposed."

The organization urges the total suppression of the liquor traffic; provides a system of mutual aid, which is optional; short degree work, also optional; and does not wholly discard the machinery, titles, charters, etc., of the other secret temperance orders. The great objection, however, is removed and marks a growing and reasonable change in popular conviction on the question of pledged or sworn secrecy.

It is a fact which ought to be confessed by temperance workers everywhere, that the reform has outgrown the cumbersome, old-world methods of the orders. The W. C. T. U. constitutional amendment and Prohibition party movements lead the way to success in this noble cause. Lodge tactics hinder and drag, and sometimes destroy.

MIXED MASONIC RELIGION.

"There's a screw loose somewhere" in Masonic religion. "Sir" E. T. Carson, of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templars in Ohio, told the Grand Commandery, the other day: "The Mason's creed is belief in God; the Templar's belief is in God the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost. Every Companion Royal Arch Mason who aspires to become a Knight Templar has to make a declaration in writing that he is a firm believer in the Christian religion, which is something more than a Mason's creed. The Templar's creed of to-day was the Mason's creed of 1717."

The last sentence has reference to the "revival" of Masonry at the Apple-Tree Tavern, Covent Garden, London, in 1717, when the first grand lodge of speculative Freemasonry was formed. "From the Apple-Tree Tavern Lodge," says Mackey's Lexicon, "there were bitter feuds and sectarian quarrels, which kept up two or three rival grand lodges, wrangling for the spoils, until 1813." There was nothing very Christian in that, surely; and if the Knights Templars are such Christians they have nothing in the pure religion of the Lord Jesus Christ to boast of. He came to teach a Gospel of peace and good will, not to establish (as did Mahomet) an army with banners and weapons of war.

Morris' Dictionary says: "The orders of Knight Templar and Knight of Malta, together with many of the degrees and orders in Scotch Masonry, are intensely Christian." "The knight who was the subject of them," said the late President Blanchard, "was a religious gladiator; while Christ's servants did not fight. (John 18: 36.) The Masonic Knight kneels for initiation on crossed swords, his hand on swords crossed before him on an open Bible. His heathen libation is wine drank from a human skull; and the 'doctrines' he professes are secrecy and bloodshed—both contrary to the teachings of Christ." "In secret have I said nothing." (John 18: 20.) And

David was not permitted to build a temple to the Lord because he had been a blood-shedder. (This temple, afterward built by Solomon, is the one about which Masonic legendry tells so many falsehoods, even to this day.)

If "Sir" Carson is right, the Masonic religion of the present is not Christianity; and he is right; for Mackey's Encyclopædia (page 641) says it is not—"nor even a substitute for it."

The Knight Templars' open doctrines may be "intensely Christian" but we have shown that their secret rites are more intensely heathenish. If "the Templars' creed of to-day was a Mason's creed in 1717," it was bitterly sectarian and un-Christian—"wrangling for the spoils" for nearly a century!

The Voice of Masonry for January prints "The Lord's Prayer Masonicized," and, as usual whenever the fraternity undertakes anything in connection with Christianity, makes a mess of it. Here is a specimen brick:

The Mason's path through all this vale of care
Directs the rule, the compass and the square;
But yet among its hosts, while 'gainst our laws,
The low and vicious often show their claws!

Also another:

Thy temples firmly founded in thy lands;
It rests on Masons' hearts and Masons' hands.

And winds up with "so mote it be!"

The religion of Masonry is indeed badly mixed. If it were not so wicked, it would be laughable.

IN MEMORIAM.

At the last meeting of the Board of Directors of the National Christian Association, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"WHEREAS, The President of this Board of Directors, and our brother in this Association, Rev. GEORGE R. MILTON, who was for years a true and faithful fellow-helper with us in the Lord's work, has recently been called out from this world to his rest and reward; therefore,

"Resolved, That it is a pleasure to us to bear testimony to the earnest Christian character and devoted service of our departed brother; and, further,

"Resolved, That we express to his widow, our sister, Mrs. Milton, our heartfelt sympathy in this time of her bereavement, and assure her that in her affliction we also are afflicted; and, further,

"Resolved, That we hereby renew our consecration to this cause, which was so near to our brother's heart, and once more testify our faith that this movement against secret societies is of God, in the interest of his church and of our fellow-men, and that it will surely triumph in the end."

BRO. ARNOLD'S STEAM TUG ALMOST IN SIGHT.

Some time ago Bro. I. R. B. Arnold asked the friends of his river mission and "the floating chapel" to contribute $1,500, with which to purchase a steam tug, to be used in towing the floating chapel from place to place, especially against the currents encountered in ascending streams.

The chapel, we learn, is doing an excellent work—work that is much needed along the rivers—work of which those unacquainted with the necessities of a river mission can know but little; but this work has been greatly hindered by delays that steam-power would have prevented.

A steamer that was purchased a short time ago for $1,500 was, more recently, sold at sheriff's sale, and the present owner offers to sell it to the floating chapel for the small sum of $300. If the friends of the river mission can assist Bro. Arnold at once, $240 will help him as much now as five times that amount will later. Bro. Arnold has already received about $60.

Shall the steamer be put into the work at once? Contributions may be sent to I. R. B. Arnold, at Evansville, Ind. Let him have a hearty response.

—Ex-Secretary Blaine is reported dying, and it is also stated that a Presbyterian clergyman was called to his bedside.

tained by him who speaks it. This outdoes the old philosophic individualism!

The old gentleman asked me what became of Wm. Morgan. I replied, briefly, that he was taken by three Masons appointed by the Masonic lodge out into the Niagara river and drowned until he was dead. His reply was the harsh, strident, open-mouthed, never-to-be-mistaken Masonic laugh. And thus our dialogue ended. I was most profoundly struck with the poor man's ignorance. Most Masons save this display of ignorance by preserving the jewel of silence.

The lectures were listened to with attention, and I trust with profit. I visited a goodly number and distributed literature and subscriptions for the Cynosure until Saturday evening.

I met Rev. W. W. McMillan and Messrs. R. M. Atchison and Hiram Curtis, earnest friends of reform; all these of Olathe. This county is full of friends of every desirable Christian reform. I met many of them, as Miss Lizzie McNaughten and sisters, the Miller Bros., Sam. Gilbraith, Mr. T. B. Marvin, and others. I hope to do more work in that vicinity before long.

W. C. PADEN.

REV. WM. FENTON IN WISCONSIN.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Jan. 4, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—At the close of the Wisconsin State Convention, Rev. C. H. Chase, pastor of the Free Methodist church at Beaver Dam, invited me to accompany him and deliver an address in his church; the invitation was accepted, and the address was delivered. A seceding Mason was present, and endorsed the truth as far as he had seen it in the lodge; and he also expressed his thanks for the address. These public addresses, exposing the rascality of Masonry, are a help appreciated by seceding Masons. "Demits" are Satan's mortgage-notes, to be paid by holders in eternal damnation. If seceding Masons are fools enough to believe the Masonic god's lie, "Once a Mason, always a Mason", they will pay for their folly in eternity.

One Masonic M. E. pastor says that President Finney "told an infamous lie." When the Methodist preacher was asked if Pres. Finney told the lie when he took the Masonic obligation, or when he broke it, he declined to say. But we say that Masonry itself is an infamous lie, and no man can embrace Masonry, therefore, without being an infamous liar, and President Finney did an honest and an honorable thing when he broke the Masonic oath.

I visited nearly all the pastors in Beaver Dam and the Baptist school at this place; and the only open door for the truth against Satan, the prince of liars, was that of the Free Methodist church. There is a German Lutheran church in Beaver Dam; and its pastor, Rev. Mr. Goldhammer, read from their constitution the paragraph that requires all members of secret societies to be excluded from their church fellowship; and no doubt they are careful to observe the rule; but he did not think best to allow his church to be opened for an address.

The Wisconsin State Convention, at Poynette, was a lively one. It is not often that a Presbyterian church will open its doors for the kind of truth, Anti-masonic, presented at this convention. But its pastor, Rev. Dr. Green, not only opened his church, but took an active and very demonstrative part in the exercises. The Presbyterians have an academy at Poynette, of which Dr. Green is the president. He also entertained some of the delegates at his own house, and that in the most hospitable manner, the delegates entertained by him being Free Methodist pastors.

The work of the convention was not confined to secret societies, but Rev. C. V. Hughes delivered an address on Romanism, and President Gault spoke on the character of our national government with regard to religion. Bro. Hinman's address on secretism was very clear and incisive. Infanticide, by so-called respectable people, etc., were treated of by Rev. J. K. Galoway, Rev. Dr. Green, and others.

I have more to say about Minnesota, but perhaps this is enough for the present time.

W. FENTON.

THE WISCONSIN STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

POYNETTE, Wis., Jan. 4, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—It may be interesting to your readers to see the Masonic report of our convention which appeared in our local newspaper. It is as follows:

"The State Reform(?) Association has been in session at the Presbyterian church this week, and while we were not present at any of the meetings, we hear they were well-attended, but that the speakers, professing to be disciples of the meek and lowly Christ, were sadly deficient of that spirit that has 'malice toward none but charity to all.' Free speech is guaranteed to all, but let he that is without guilt cast the first stone. When the traveler fell among thieves and was robbed and wounded, the priest and Levite passed by on the other side, while the man of Samaria, a non-professor, came and ministered to his wants. Who showed brotherly love and a Christ-like spirit? Judge ye."

The following is my answer:

MR. EDITOR:—You seem to be in doubt with regard to the character of the meetings held here last week. If you had attended those meetings, there would have been no need for that interrogation point, for the public verdict is, that, if that was not a reform convention, Poynette has never seen one.

I am sorry, my brother, that you should take up a false report, and throw cold water on such meetings.

There was no malice in the convention; it was all outside.

But you surely misquote and misapply Scripture. You know that the Jews, instead of cutting the throat and taking out the tongue by the roots, executed the death-penalty by stoning. That is what Christ condemned, not bearing testimony against evil.

If the rule, "He that is without sin," etc., should be applied against witness-bearing, then such testimony must forever cease from pulpit and platform; for you know the Word says: "There is not a just man upon the earth that doeth good and sinneth not."

Now, with regard to the Samaritan parable: Allow me to give you another version: The travelers in this case are the men who came to the convention. The Masons, for the most part, were the priests and Levites who passed by on the other side, i. e., did not attend. The Good Samaritan was the fair-minded men (Masons and others) of Poynette, who took us in, instead of sending us to the woods as some would have done who are under bonds and afraid to say Mah-hah-bone out loud.

J. B. GALLOWAY.

WAUKESHA, Wis., Jan. 7, 1893.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Through the rich blessing of God, every circumstance favored our late Wisconsin State Convention. A few days before it convened there was a lull in the severe storms that had been drifting up the roads in that part of the State; the cold weather moderated; the sleighing was the very best, and the moonlight excellent. Bro. Hinman, one of the veterans of this reform, who had been in feeble health, came a day before the convention, much revived, and spoke with his old-time vigor. Few, if any, have spoken as often, and traveled as many miles in the interest of this reform as he. Then we had Bro. Wm. Fenton, so well posted in the heathen origin of these dark systems, and who is always ready to prove, from their own standard authorities, every assertion he makes. We also had that veteran worker, Bro. Isaac Bancroft, who, years ago, traversed the State, lecturing in this reform.

We were then inspired by a strong delegation of ministers from the Free Methodist church. They were Rev. Messrs. R. Pate, of Baraboo; C. V. Hughes, of Portage; A. Longfield, and E. P. Tullis, of Pardeeville, and Rev. C. H. Chase, of Beaver Dam. Their church was the most strongly represented of any in the State, and is the most uncompromisingly committed in its opposition to these works of darkness. The fine sleighing and bright moonlight brought in a large delegation from the surrounding country, so that the large Presbyterian church was well-filled at the evening sessions. Bro. J. B. Galloway's choir of well-trained singers sang from the Bible Songs; and the best singers in the M. E. and Presbyterian church choirs in Poynette contributed excellent music. Bro. Galloway's address of welcome put the audience in good humor to listen to the response by Bro. Fenton, which was a radical presentation of the cause. Rev. C. V. Hughes gave an address filled with startling facts, showing the danger from Jesuitism. My address was on the Christless character of our politics and the foes that are sapping the church. James Mair, who had won the medal in several Demorest contests, gave us an excellent declamation on Prohibition. The interest increased with each session. Dr. W. L. Green made a profound impression by calling for the reading of the Masonic oath in the third degree, and after it was read by Bro. Fenton from "Ecce Orienti," a book in cypher published by Masons for their own use in lodges, the Doctor proceeded in a speech, characterized by great power and earnestness, to show that such an oath was horribly profane, and not only should be prohibited by the church, but also by the State. We have seldom seen an audience manifest such intense feeling as was shown during this exciting address. Dr. Green has strong convictions and is not afraid to express them. He and Dr. Swarts, of Chicago, addressed a crowded house the last evening, riveting the attention of all till after ten o'clock. Many came forward at the close, testifying to their deep interest and expressing their desire that such a convention be held in their town.

"The mighty Lord of Gideon

Was with us once again,

As when of old Sennacherib's host

Lay dead on battle plain."

M. A. GAULT.

VERNON, Wis., January 6, 1893.

The following officers of the Wisconsin Christian Association were elected at the recent State convention at Poynette:

President, Rev. J. B. Galloway (U. P.), Poynette; Secretary, Rev. Isaiah Faris (R. P.), Vernon; Treasurer, J. W. Wood (S. D.), Baraboo.

Vice Presidents: Rev. A. A. Martin (W. M.), Tomah; Rev. E. L. Harris (Bap.), Delavan; Rev. Isaac Bancroft (Cong), Monroe; Rev. Geo. M. Weng (Luth.), Oshkosh; Rev. L. B. Webb (F. M.), Evansville. ISAAH FARIS, Secretary.

FROM THE EASTERN AGENT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 6, 1893.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have been excusing myself for not writing during the past weeks, as I have been at the "hub," in the land of the Pilgrim fathers, where writers are abundant and anti-secrecy speakers need make no apology. Down in Boston they think and speak for themselves. The call "who is on the Lord's side?" is there being made, and we find enough to make a large "tea party" ready to cast off the shackles of lodge-slavery. Those in whose breasts burns the flame of true liberty may not long be trampled by the lodge when they know the facts. I am not surprised that the last New England Convention was the best. Mr. Mason, in New England, has got to squarely meet the facts. The time of "you don't know, and you can't know unless you belong," has passed, and the time of, "we can know, and we will know," has come to those who think.

I need not write of the grand workers there. They are well-known by their contributions to the Cynosure. My work for the past month has been largely around the borders. To use the hunter's phrase, I have watched the Pilgrim fathers and mothers do the shooting, while I gathered the game.

Quite an enlargement has been secured to the list of those in and around Boston who read our paper. There is an opportunity to secure subscribers in this literary center not always found. The list of those seceding from the lodges is constantly on the increase in Boston, as elsewhere. Fully one-third of those who identified themselves with us at the convention had at some time belonged to one or more of the lodges.

Brother Andrew Wilson said that the first time he remembered seeing his mother in tears, on his account, was the night when he joined the lodge. That night he took his first drink of liquor. Until rescued in a Chicago mission he had led a dissipated life, but since, by God's help, he had been enabled to lead others from the lodge and saloon to Christ.

Brother Crowell, of Chelsea, had for years been opposing the corruption that he saw in courts of justice (so-called), and is prepared, as he thinks, to give satisfactory evidence that the Masonic rather than the civil oath has been heeded in numerous instances. He will doubtless give Cynosure readers the benefit of his observations at an opportune time.

Another seceding brother especially objected to the oaths he was required to take in the Masonic lodge. He did not believe any Christian man could adhere to such oaths, and cited, as in point, the clause in the Master Mason's obligation where the candidate swears to immediately fly to the relief of the one giving the grand hailing sign of distress, murder and treason excepted, and they left to his own option.

He was told, that he purposed to leave, "once a Mason, always a Mason," but he did not so reason. It might as reasonably be said, once a false swearer, always a false swearer. Masonry makes no provision for repentance.

I am now planning a trip to Pennsylvania, and shall hope to confer with the State committee and announce the time and place for the next State convention soon.

Things generally appear to be in rather a frozen condition here. Those having sleighs and time to use them are regarded fortunate.

W. B. STODDARD.

M. N. BUTLER'S WORK IN MISSOURI.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Monday and Tuesday night, December 26 and 27, I spoke at Hight Point, some three miles east of Bethany. In this vicinity resides Wm. Selby and his sons, all opposed to the lodge; also our old friend Alfred Meek and the Alley Bros. Just east, at Thomas, are the Linthicums and other substantial citizens, strong Americans. Owing to meetings in progress at the latter place I did not speak, but conversed, and left literature with many people.

My next point was above Mt. Moriah, where I spoke four nights to full houses. Seldom have we ever had such crowds during the holiday season. The church was filled in spite of festivals and parties. Some lodge-men lost their jewels, and the fraters at Mt. Moriah suggested the propriety of "killing" the lecturer; and it seems that there were called-meetings of some of the county lodges to look after the interests of the craft. Bro. J. S. Wright and family are "old-guard" anti-secretists, who are always in the forefront of battle, and ready to do all in their power to further all righteous reform. W. H. Milton, G. L. Wright, Josephus Emery, A. J. Wright, Levi Robinson, and others, shared their hospitality with the agitator, and the interest manifested by old and young in this community in lectures and degree-work was most gratifying. Here we met again Rev. Geo. W. Stewart, Past Master of three Masonic lodges, who attested to the audience the absolute truthfulness of the degree-work.

Sabbath night closed our twelfth lecture in eastern Harrison county, and the end is not. Hundreds have heard the truth for the first time, and the outspoken opposition to organized secretism is phenomenal. But our distribution of "Masonic Government," and like literature, in the country, from the suburbs of Bethany to the Mercer county line, has carried the war into Egypt and put many a lodge-man into hot water. Women and children read, and then the poor lodge-man is pestered terribly to satisfy their very natural curiosity.

And now I am off to see the noblest woman of all and four little girls that call me papa.

M. N. BUTLER.

Address, Darlington, Mo.

MT. MORIAH, Mo., Jan. 2, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Bro. M. N. Butler gave us four anti-secret lectures, beginning Thursday night, at our Union church. He and I were both happily surprised to meet each other again, after some years' separation; and were mutually rejoiced to find that each had been faithfully employed in the great work of reform.

I think the Hand-book is the best of anything yet published to supply the young people with Anti-masonic facts.

Brother Butler had a large and attentive audience, and we think he has greatly improved as a speaker. A few secret men were present.

Brother Butler is a hopeful worker, and, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, is revealing the hidden works of darkness which are carried on in the secret chambers.

We could see, through his word-painting, the fish going down the stream, beneath the surface of the water; their life-boats of salvation eternally wrecked; and all for a mess of pottage.

Yours truly,

GEO. W. STEWART.

THE HOME.

TRUST HIM AND WAIT.

Trust Him and wait, O troubled soul,
When cares encompass thee about,
And strong temptations o'er thee roll,
And from the dark seems no way out,
And life seems shrouded all in doubt.

Trust Him and wait. Ah, well He knows
How sad and rough the way for thee;
Yet sees the stinging thorns He sows
At last shall make thee but more free,
And in His likeness moulded be.

Trust Him and wait. He knoweth best
The discipline each heart doth need;
In His heart-will let thy heart rest,
And all His lessons haste to read
And con, and take of all wise heed!

Trust Him and wait. Thy soul more fair
Shall grow, in colors like his own;
And gentle breezes shalt thou share,
From His far blessed kingdom blown,
And walk in ways thou hadst not known!

THE CHRISTIAN'S DEATH.

The experience in death is determined by the character in life. It is sometimes true of the wicked that "there are no bands in their death," and of the righteous that clouds and darkness cover them; but the general experience is that the legitimate fruits of the life appear in the death. So marked is this that one whose eyes were opened for the time to the glory of Israel and the supreme value of righteousness, said, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." The Spirit of God was upon him as he breathed the wish, but he yielded to the spirit of evil and his death was a dishonor. David, whose knowledge of life was very great, said, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace." This is the difference: The ungodly one has no comfort in looking back over life; he has no hope in looking forward. Behind is a life of unbelief and sin; unbelief still reigns in his heart; and forward there is the judgment of God. The one who trusts in Christ knows that his sins have been pardoned and all his guilt taken away, and now faith sustains him in the assurance that the love of God rests upon him, and that his Saviour will give him the fullness of life. Therefore he is at peace. His "end is peace;" blessed peace. It may not always have been so; he has had trials and sorrows, he has known bitterness and grief, he has been tossed upon the sea in furious storms, but now, in the supreme hour, there is peace, the peace of God that passeth all understanding.

Peace is not quietness of mind obtained through effort, or simply the consequence of righteousness, but is the effect of the power of God in the soul, sustaining it in the assurance of his love. The Christian walks in trouble as others do, and death is to him also painful and alarming; sometimes the approach of death fills him with tumult, until the very anchor of hope seems to be dragging, but the power of God is present and at his word the tumult becomes a calm. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee."

Peace is Christ's peculiar gift. When about to be separated from his disciples, and wishing to assure their hearts, he said, "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you." That which the world cannot give, and as the world does not give anything, he gives to his disciples—his own peace in the presence of death. His mind was stayed on God, his soul was filled with assurance of his love, his faith looked forward to the life and crown awaiting him, and amidst the sorrows of that fearful hour he was in perfect peace. That same state of mind he gives to those who trust and follow him. The Christian dies under the shadow of the Most High, with the assurance of safety, in the light of his Father's face, and in the confidence of the love that cannot be broken by death as it has not been disturbed by life. Earth is fading away, "but the better country" is rising into clearer view. The voices of friends become indistinct, but he hears the voice of the Lord: "Fear not, for I am with you." Death holds him in his grasp, but life in Christ rises into its fullness in triumph. By the peculiar process of grace, and by the power of God, the humble believer is thus led up into like experience with Christ, so that even though darkness comes upon him for a time, he is able to say, as a child turns its face to the bosom of the father who holds it in his arms, "Father, into thy hand I commit my spirit."

Such a death is the crown of a life of faith and righteousness, and is one of the happy fruits of union with Christ. It is the royal diadem which Christ, within the sight of all, places upon the brow of those who love him. Death is the opening of the door into the new life in the world to come, and this peace is the glory of that life beaming upon the soul, making it radiant with the likeness of Christ, in whom it is about to be made perfect forever.

Is there the fear of death? It is natural to shrink from the great change, to dread the unseen and the unknown, to tremble and sink under suffering; but the grace of God is given as it is needed. At every step in life Christ is with us, to give the help we need at that moment. As we come into the presence of death, we also come into the possession of the grace for that moment. Christ prayed in agony, but as he prayed the angel of the Lord stood by him and strengthened him. His whole life had been of faith, and in the hour of the power of darkness his faith did not fail, for he was heard and safely kept. Like faith in life is rewarded with like grace in death. Doubts kept until they become habits of mind, fears cherished until they become abiding tenants of the soul, will doubtless often be followed by pain and soul trouble, but even for such is the assurance that the Lord hears the cry of the troubled soul and delivers from all fears; at the last there is deliverance from the bondage of the fear of death. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee.—United Presbyterian.

DRIVING OUT THE BIBLE.

There are some "helps" which prove to be hindrances, and it has long been evident that some of the helps to Bible study were taking more attention than the Bible itself. Every denomination has its "Lesson Papers," sold by millions every year. They are useful, no doubt, and there is money in the business, and of course, as long as there is money in it, it will go on. But there is also danger in it, and one danger is, the lesson paper, containing the printed lesson, drives the Bible out of the Sunday-school. Persons get the lesson paper and read over the lesson, and have little use for the Bible. We have known instances where at family worship in the morning the lesson contained in the paper took the place of the regular reading of the Scriptures. Dr. McLean, a secretary of the American Bible Society, has at length called attention to the danger to which we have referred.

"What first drew my attention to the gradual exclusion of the Bible for the lesson leaflet in our Sunday-schools, was the fact that the issues of entire Bibles by the society did not constitute a sufficient supply for the Sunday-schools alone, and I became convinced that a vast majority of the Sunday-school children had no Bible. The total circulation for the last year was 936,578, and these figures embrace Bibles, Testaments, integral portions of the Bible, and volumes for the blind. That is manifestly a very inadequate supply for the Sunday-schools with their 8,000,000 pupils. It was this knowledge that caused the society to investigate the subject, with the result that we found the lesson leaflets fast supplanting the study of the Bible as a sacred work. While we approve of the selected excerpts from the Scripture which constitute the leaflets as helpers to the understanding of the Bible, when they take the place of the Bible itself in the Sunday-schools it is a pretty serious matter. I believe it to be a fact that the greater number of the Sunday-school children know little or nothing of the Bible as a book, and cannot tell what belongs to the Old Testament or what belongs to the New Testament. It is too often the case that the only Bible in the Sunday-school is the one on the superintendent's desk; and it is not alone the children who are ignorant of the Scriptures, but very frequently the teachers themselves."

Of course there is much that is good in many of the lesson papers; still we are sometimes reminded of the Hibernian, who, when offered some hash, declined, saying, "Let the man that chewed it ate it;" and if some of the men who make lesson papers had to study them themselves, and would give the children the Bible and the Testament just for a change, and let them learn to repeat the parables, the psalms, the Ten Commandments, the beatitudes and the teachings of the Saviour, we are of opinion that the cause of Bible truth and pure religion would be greatly advanced.

What are persons likely to know of the Scriptures if they simply memorize a detached sentence, which somebody has called a "golden text?" What men most need is to search the Scriptures, to know the Word of God; and when we know what God has said then we are prepared to enquire what he means. But after people have spent years in spiritualizing and mystifying the Scriptures, it is not strange that they should then begin to whittle and criticise them away.

Hold fast the faithful Word. Do not devote all the time to studying about the Bible; take some time to study the book itself. It will pay you for the labor. It is better than thousands of silver and gold. When you go to Sunday-school to study the Bible, take the Bible with you; and if you leave your lesson paper at home it will probably be no great loss to you or to any one else, unless it is some teacher too lazy to learn and too ignorant to teach others.—The Armory (Boston).

NEW YEAR RESOLUTIONS.

New Year's day is proverbially a day for "turning over a new leaf"—for making new resolutions. How many there are who on that day promise themselves they will lead a better life; they will give greater attention to religious and other duties! They resolve to be more inclined to the poor, more thoughtful to the afflicted, more consistent and true in all the relations of life. Alas, that such good resolutions are so often broken!

January passes, July is reached, the fall of the year creeps on, and winter brings another New Year's day to surprise us with the wreck of all our resolutions. Then we begin again to gild the future with new determinations, to last no longer than the former ones. But sometimes we fulfill our resolves, and are put forward to a greater degree of virtue by these annual attempts. It will not do, then, for us to give up trying because we fail so often.

This New Year's habit of "turning over a new leaf" in our morals, as well as in our cash-books, is about the best habit we can indulge in; far better than the liquor-drinking so much in vogue. Even if it be true that "hell is paved with good intentions," it is better to resolve and re-resolve again than to give up hopelessly because of our frequent failures. The good intentions will not "pave hell" unless they should be broken; that is, the remorse of the wicked after death will not ensue from their good endeavors, but from their abandonment of them.

Therefore, let the boy and girl, the young man and woman, the middle-aged, and the old, seize this hopeful day now as ever, with a cheerful spirit for self-improvement. Write it down in your diaries, or at least fix it in your minds, that the old year is irrecoverably past, with its follies and short-comings, and that the new year is new for you in every light, unspotted as yet with sin, nearer the other end of your life, and may be higher in everything that is worth living for. The old year is out of your reach—the new year is in your power!—Selected.

A TRUE STORY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

It was on a bright autumn evening, more than threescore years ago, that Abraham Lincoln, then a great awkward boy of sixteen or seventeen, looked in at the door of a little log cabin on the edge of one of the Western prairies and said pleasantly, "I'm going off into the woods to chop, to-morrow, mother; I've got a dandy job over at Laird's, and as I shall be obliged to start by day-break, I quit work early this evening so I could attend any chores you might like to have done."

"You are a good boy, Abraham, to be always thinking of helping me," said the woman addressed as mother. "If I was your own mother you could not be better to me, and you will be rewarded for all your kindness in the end, I am sure."

"I have a right to be good to you, mother; for have you not tried most faithfully to take my own dead mother's place?" insisted Abraham. "No one who has been blessed with two such good mothers as I have had could ever be anything but good to women folks. But you have not told me how I can help you yet, and it is almost dark," he insisted, rubbing the moisture from his eyes with his coarse sleeve.

"Well, as I am going to wash, to-morrow. I would be ever so thankful if you would bring me a few buckets of water from the spring and call the cow up for me to milk. It is hard telling how far out over the prairie she may have strayed," was the woman's reply. "I have not set eyes on her since morning."

"Trust me for finding her," answered Abraham.

"What's the use of my long legs if they can't out-travel a cow? But I reckon I'd best bring the water first. And here is Sally waiting for a ride," he added, placing upon his shoulder his little step-sister, who had come running out the moment she heard the water-buckets begin to jingle.

Back and forth the tall, gaunt prairie boy hurried, until all the tubs and kettles about the cabin were full to the brim with clear, sparkling water.

"You see, sis, I am going to chop myself out a suit of clothes," he said in answer to a question from the little girl perched so comfortably upon his shoulder.

"Chop yourself a suit!" laughed the child. "Whoever heard of wooden clothes?"

"We shall see," Abraham replied as he set down his bucket of water and deposited Sally on the steps and started off in search of the missing cow.

"Bless the boy! I could not get along without him," said his mother, stopping her work for a minute to gaze fondly after him.

"There is no call for your getting along without, at least for many a year to come," remarked her husband, who had entered the back door in time to catch her words.

"He'll not stay here always, you may set that down. Abraham Lincoln was born for something better than he'll ever find in the life we are living. You may live to see the day that you'll be proud to call him son," was the earnest reply.

"Abraham is a good boy, wife, but your ideas about him are somewhat visionary," returned his father with a smile. "It is not good for boys to get high notions about themselves into their heads, and I hope Abraham will always be content to make an honest living as his father has done."

Early in the morning before it was cleverly light Abraham was ready to set off for the place where the rails were to be split; but early as it was, Sally was up too, determined to keep her big brother company during his long walk across the country.

"Can't I go, Abraham?" she begged, after her mother had refused the desired permission. "Can't I go? Say yes, quick," demanded the impulsive child.

"Just as mother says," replied the big brother, pausing to give the little girl an opportunity to consult her mother. But Sally had no intention of saying anything more to her mother on the subject, and tried to hurry him off down the path before her absence would be noticed. Abraham would not move a foot, however, until he knew his mother's wishes, which soon came in a positive command for Sally to come back into the house. It was a very reluctant obedience that Sally accorded, and as soon as her brother was out of sight she determined to follow him, and at once cut across the field, intending to reach the ravine before him and give him a genuine surprise by jumping out unannounced in the path as he came up. She carried out her plan successfully, and when she heard his merry whistle in the distance she climbed up on the bank to be ready to make the spring for his shoulders when the proper moment should arrive. But the poor child had forgotten all about the sharp axe which he carried, and although she gained her coveted seat on his broad shoulders, her little bare foot received a gash from the cruel axe, which changed her merry laugh to a bitter cry without a moment's warning.

"Why, Sally! How did you get here?" was all the boy could say as he placed her tenderly on the bank and began an examination of the wounded foot. Finding it to be a deep cut, he gathered some broad plaitain leaves which grew near, and by their aid soon succeeded in staunching the flow of blood, which had at first frightened both himself and Sally. This accomplished, he tore the sleeve from his shirt, and in his clumsy way bandaged the injured foot as well as he knew how. Then as he carried the little girl home he drew from her the story of her disobedience. She would have been willing to evade the truth in order to screen herself from her mother's displeasure, but honest, truthful Abraham would not permit this.

"Tell the truth, Sally, no matter what the consequences may be," he insisted. "Better suffer punishment than lie about it. I do not think mother will be hard on you when she sees how sorely punished you are already, but never tell a lie to shield yourself—never."

Sally took his advice, and her mother was very willing to forgive her when she saw how really sorry she was; and from that day forth Sally never forgot how sacred a thing perfect honesty is.

THE EVERLASTING ARMS.

Like shadows fleeting o'er the wall,
Earth's varying tribes appear;
But growth and death await us all—
The smile, the sigh, the tear.

Still on we press, o'er vale and steep,
'Neath sunbeam, storm, and blast;
The cradle gives our earliest sleep,
The coffin-box our last.

Yet let the wildest tempests moan,
If with their wrath severe,
Our Father's arms are round us thrown,
Say, what have we to fear?

Why should we strive for riches proud,
Or covet honors bright?
See, like the moaning, changeful cloud,
They fade, and take their flight.

Why should we droop when joys decay,
When hopes are overthrown?
There's nothing in this house of clay
That we can call our own.

Why should we shrink from ills and pain?
For though the world be drear,
"The everlasting arms" sustain,
And what have we to fear?

TEMPERANCE.

RAFFLING FOR A BIBLE.

Within sound of the chimes of Old Trinity there stands a well-known liquor saloon, whose grimy walls are so covered with cobwebs as to give them the appearance of being festooned with black drapery. Here gather night after night the sons of toil to spend their hard earnings in riotous living. One evening the dingy saloon was crowded, the usual number of rounders being supplemented by a large outside contingent, drawn thither by the rather anomalous announcement of a "Bible Raffle."

The book was a handsome one, and had been placed there by a person who said he had no use for it, and would rather have the money. As each of the bleary-eyed, dissipated denizens went forward to shake the dice box, there was a roar of laughter, followed by any amount of chaff and blasphemous jesting. As the contest waxed hotter, a man, a little better dressed than the rest of them, was awakened from his slumbers and told to take a hand, as he was always lucky. He staggered up to the counter, took the dice box and threw the highest number. A shout went up from the boisterous crowd that gathered around him, each with a jest and a query as to what he was going to do with it. Where would he keep it? How much would he take for it? Would he stand treat? etc.

The man seemed to become sober in a minute, and, without noticing their jibes, took the holy book in his hands as tenderly as he would have lifted an infant, and said to the bar-tender:

"Please wrap this in the cleanest piece of paper you have, Jim, but don't let it have the smell of whisky about it."

Then, turning to the amazed group, who watched with open-mouthed astonishment, he said:

"Good evening, gentlemen. It's the last time we'll meet here. I'm going home to make one of the best wives in the world the happiest woman in New York to-night;" and, placing the Bible under his arm, he passed out of the crowd, jeered by some, but lustily cheered by others.

He walked rapidly in the direction of his squalid quarters, where, from the flicker of a dim light, he knew that his faithful wife awaited him, mounted the rickety stairs, and, entering the room, walked straight up to where she sat sewing by a few expiring coals, and laid the heavy parcel on her lap. She started, and, looking up with a faint semblance of the old and almost forgotten smile, said:

"Why, you are early to-night, John." She saw that a change had come over him, and quietly opened the package, while he stood watching her. As the blessed book was revealed to her she burst into tears, and, taking him by the hand, said:

"John, I've been thinking about you all day, and wondering if you would ever be your own, old self again, when I could feel proud of you as I used to—and, while I was thinking, little Agnes came up, and, putting her arms around my neck, said: 'Mamma, why don't papa have prayers, and read his Bible, as grandpapa does, when we go to see him?' I could not answer her, John, but now you can."

"Yes, I'll answer her, wife; get me a pen and some ink."

The wife rose as in a trance, for it was the first time in weeks that he had come home sober; then he opened the fly-leaf and wrote upon it,

"To my faithful wife, whom I shall never again voluntarily cause a sorrow or a blush of shame.—John."

As she read it their tears mingled, and the bright lights of her far-away home seemed to glimmer in the distance. The present was forgotten, and they were once more respected citizens where his name had been a synonym for all that was honorable and loyal. It was almost morning when they retired, but new resolves had been taken, vows replighted, hopes revived and ambition stimulated.

God grant that the divine energy of his ever-living Word may thus brighten many a shadowed home, and bring an abiding blessing where sin has cast a dark and withering curse.—Union Signal.

SAFETY ALONE IN ABSTINENCE.

The Scottish League Journal makes the following sensible remarks, which are even more applicable to Scotland than elsewhere: "The habit of drinking is formed and rooted, not in the company of drunkards but in the company of the 'moderate' drinking portion of the community. It is there that drink appears to the young in its most fascinating sparkle, and they are led on until the habit of drinking is confirmed, and the drink crave superinduced. There are rich people who would not grudge to pay a large sum to cure those of their relatives who are enslaved by drink, but who will not banish the liquor, which has wrought the mischief from their homes. It is not an uncommon experience for an inebriate who has been a patient in a retreat for the cure of intemperance to see, on their return home, that seductive wine-glass which had been their ruin occupying its accustomed place on the dinner-table. Thus, even though an effectual remedy was discovered for drunkenness, it is only in homes where no intoxicating liquors enter that absolute safety could be found for those who had been cured."

DRINK IN IRELAND.

The New York Advocate says: "The problem as to what shall be done for Ireland is one which is just now claiming much attention on the part of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Morley and others of the new British government. Whatever may or may not be done concerning 'home rule,' there is obviously great need for some decisive action with reference to the ravages of the drink traffic in Ireland. In 1881 there was 78,573 arrests for drunkenness in Ireland, and last year, 1891, there were 100,202 such arrests, and yet in the face of these ominous facts, 415 new licenses were granted during 1891, for the sale of intoxicating liquors in Ireland. Something effective must be done to arrest the destructive drink traffic, or anything which may be done concerning 'home rule' will avail but little to promote the prosperity of the people of Ireland."

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Joshua and his adversary.—v. 1. Though Zechariah is classed among the minor prophets, no other prophetic writer—not even Isaiah—has brought out the great Gospel truth of salvation from sin through Christ with greater force or beauty. Indeed, the vision which is the subject of our present lesson reminds us of the scene in Bunyan's immortal allegory, in which Christian loses his burden of inbred sin, and his rags are exchanged for the coat of his Redeemer's perfect righteousness. Zechariah's message was one especially intended to inspire the people with fresh heart and hope. Thus in the first vision God shows him the Jewish church under the type of the lowly but fragrant myrtle trees. This shrub delights in low, swampy places and is represented as growing in the river bottom;—an allusion to the scene of Judah's captivity in the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris. Among the myrtle trees he sees horses of various colors, representing God's various ministers or forces, some of vengeance and some of mercy, who work out his will among the nations. Then he sees four horns, emblematic of the four great world powers; but these are silently destroyed, filed away, by an equal number of mysterious agencies. Next an angel, who proceeds to measure Jerusalem, but is forbidden to do so, because her future glory is to be without limit. Then we come to the fourth and crowning vision, for of what use were all these encouraging words unless the people could feel that the sins which had caused their captivity were indeed purged away? How could they build the temple with unclean hands? A great moral and spiritual reformation was clearly needed; yet how often objection is made to having reform subjects, especially if on an unpopular line, discussed in our churches, on the ground that the work of the church is not to preach reform but to save souls. But how can she do this, her legitimate work; how can she build up God's spiritual temple, unless she puts from her midst every evil thing? In point of fact a reform church will always be a revived church. Joshua represents the Jewish people whom Satan was resisting in their efforts to build the temple. Do we realize that the greater the work we undertake for God the more surely does Satan stand at our right hand to resist us? The slothful, self-seeking, worldly Christian, who never opposes the devil or his works, meets with no opposition himself from the great adversary.

2. Satan rebuked.—vs. 2-4. Two facts are stated, each of which is a rebuke to Satan. (1) "The Lord hath chosen Jerusalem." If God chooses us to do a work for him, that choice is sufficient answer to all that Satan may tell us regarding our own personal unfitness. (2) "Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?" Though the smell of fire be upon us, the very fact that we are saved is proof enough that God intended us—we, our individual selves—to do a work that he designed no one else to do. Joshua, in his filthy garments, was a fitting type of the idolatrous, backsliding Jewish people; but we must not lose sight of its wider application, for he is also the type of the sinner in his natural condition before being pardoned and cleansed. Isaiah uses the same figure, when he says: "Our righteousness is as filthy rags." "Change of raiment" means literally, in the original, "rich apparel." So when we accept Christ's righteousness we receive the princely dress of one who is a child in the household of God. Notice that it is through the divine, transforming power of his Holy Spirit that our iniquity is "made to pass away" from us. We cannot cleanse ourselves, but a greater power must take possession of our wills and thus do the work.

3. Joshua's priesthood.—vs. 5-7. We are made not only kings but priests unto God. So, until the spotless mitre with its golden band was placed on Joshua's head the work of restoration was not complete. "If thou shalt walk in my ways," etc. Paul speaks of the saints as judging angels, and the priestly office in itself implies religious, as the office of king implies civil, rule. It is only through humble obedience now that we can become qualified for such high ministry in the future. "I will give thee places to walk among them that stand by," that is, the angels of God. It is the same promise which in Hebrews 4: 16 we find in the form of an exhortation.

4. Christ prophesied.—vs. 8-10. The returned Jews were a small and feeble remnant. The nation was like a tree cut down to the stump, but its roots were alive, and from them was to spring that heavenly Branch whose shadow was to bless all nations. In the next verse he is spoken of under a different figure, that of a living stone with seven eyes graven upon it, to denote spiritual completeness. He is a perfect Saviour, not only as regards his redeeming work, but is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification;—everything that we lack. The seven eyes may also denote that perfect intelligence which takes notice of everything pertaining to his kingdom. The last verse of our lesson introduces us to millennial blessedness, when the universal reign of Christ will make the whole earth one scene of festal joy.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The National Baptist, in speaking of the Baptists of Pennsylvania, reports a deplorable state of affairs: Of the 601 Baptist churches in the State (not including the Welsh churches or those belonging to New York associations), 156 report no contributions to the State Mission Society (outside of the Pittsburg Association, which was not at this time co-operating); 268, nothing to the Education Society; 300, nothing to the Publication Society; 256, nothing to Home Missions; 278, nothing to Foreign Missions. And the offerings made by the contributing churches are, in some instances, so small as to move one almost to blushes and tears. An association of 27 churches and more than 2,000 members gave but $79.25 to Foreign Missions; another, of 19 churches and 2,600 members, gave $157.

BOYS' BRIGADE

—The report at the eighth annual meeting of the Boys' Brigade Council, showed a marked increase in the brigade during the year. The number of companies has increased to 490. These companies are connected with churches and Sunday-schools of all denominations. The officers have increased 317 in the year. The boys have increased 3,743.

BRETHREN.

—The program of the Ministerial Meeting of Northern Illinois, to be held in the Arnold's Grove church, May 2, 1893, has been published and mailed to all the congregations in the district.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—The Chicago Union Park Theological Seminary now numbers just two hundred students. The number of universities and colleges represented is fifty-six. The students have come from twenty-seven different States and Territories, and from nine foreign countries. Sixty of them are in the foreign departments. And these two hundred young men are pretty certain to be as widely scattered after graduation as they were before coming.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN.

—A commission recently appointed by the Cumberland Presbyterian church of Illinois has organized a Chicago Presbytery in the First Cumberland Presbyterian church, Sixty-sixth court and Stewart avenue. The sermon was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Ferguson, of Petersburg, Ill.

LUTHERAN.

—According to the statistics of the Lutherische Kalender, published by T. H. Diehl, Allentown, Pa., the present number of Lutheran ministers in America is 5,242; of churches, 9,352; and of communicant members, 1,330,917. These statistics are based on the United States Census of 1890 and the synodical reports of 1892.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—The bishops of the Methodist church, at their annual meeting at Baltimore, made their usual appropriations for foreign missionary work. The following appropriations are of especial interest to Lutherans: Sweden, $23,148; Denmark, $9,411; Germany, $36,591; and Norway, $16,000. Bishop Hurst said, in respect to Norway: "Missions there should be self-supporting, inasmuch as they are twenty-five years old, and the people of Norway are Christians anyway, and not as much heathen as many Americans!" To the great, dark continent of Africa, with its scores of millions of benighted souls, for whom Christ died, and who have never heard Christ's name, $5,548 was appropriated.

—Mrs. Bishop Warren has given over $100,000 to the new Theological School at Denver.

—The Methodist ministers of Iowa have organized a Haddock Temperance League to raise funds for the enforcement of the prohibitory law.

—The Philadelphia Inquirer says: "According to a report of Bishop Walden to the general missionary committee of the Methodist Episcopal church, the Methodists propose to appropriate one thousand dollars, with the idea of beginning at Lebanon, in this State, the work of converting the Pennsylvania Germans from the Lutheran, the Reformed, the Dunkard or Mennonite church to the Methodist church. The wisdom of this kind of missionary work is not apparent."

—C. H. Yatman, the evangelist, has been secured by the Methodist Episcopal church extension society to inaugurate a work for the masses in New York City. It is proposed to open theaters and similar places for Sunday Gospel evangelistic services.

—Bishop Taylor states that about 50 per cent of the Methodist missionaries in Africa are able to endure the climate. These, he says, are so deeply interested in the work, that they could not be driven out of the country.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

—There has been, quite recently, considerable commotion in Waterford, N. Y., over the reading of the Bible in the public schools. Father Emmett, of St. Mary's church of Waterford, demanded of Superintendent Falconer that he order the teachers, to cease reading the Bible, on the ground that to do so was against the law. The superintendent declined, saying he could only act on the orders of the board of education. Then Father Emmett went to some of the teachers and ordered them to discontinue reading the Scriptures in school, and they stopped doing so. Subsequently the priest sent a letter to the board, calling their attention to the fact that the Bible was read in the schools, with a request that its reading be ordered discontinued. The board deemed the demand of Father Emmett "discourteous and impudent" and entitled to no consideration, as this priest is not even a legally qualified voter in the school district. The board passed a resolution instructing the teachers not to obey any orders or instructions except those of the board and the school superintendent, and threatening instant dismissal if orders from "outsiders" were obeyed. The Protestant clergymen of Waterford have held a union meeting.

SALVATION ARMY.

—The report of Onslow's Parliamentary committee to investigate the financial affairs of the Salvation Army speaks favorably of General Booth's enterprise for the redemption of "Darkest England". The management of the Salvation Army finances is found to be correct, and substantially worthy of commendation. As to the social wing of work, the committee is almost wholly favorable. They say that General Booth has devoted the money received by him solely in accordance with the methods mentioned in "Darkest England"; that he has faithfully endeavored to fulfill the representations made in his appeal for funds; that he has expended the money in a business-like, economical and prudent manner; and that the accounts are kept accurately and clearly. The committee states that it is evident that neither General Booth nor the members of his family derive any benefit from the funds of the Salvation Army. The committee consider that the property for Salvation Army uses is safe in the control of General Booth and his associates.

—The Bombay government has granted Salvation Army officers power to solemnize marriages between native Christians.

—From the recent report presented by Commander Ballington Booth we learn that during the past year and in all lands the indoor congregations have numbered millions, that 462 cities and towns have been "occupied," that 535 corps and outposts have been established, and that 32,433 converts have been registered.

WORLD'S FAIR SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

—The proposed World's Fair Sunday-school building will cost $50,000. It will be located outside the grounds, will be built of brick and will be paid for by the Sunday-schools in the United States, all of whom will be invited to contribute ten cents for each officer and teacher and one cent for each scholar. The exhibit will show the present condition of Sunday-school work in different parts of the world; will illustrate the growth and progress of the Sunday-school and methods of work. The building will be Sunday-school headquarters and perhaps the center of the colporteur work and personal Christian work on the ground. The central committee, representing the general committee of arrangements, is composed of B. F. Jacobs, Chicago; E. A. Hough, of Jackson, Mich.; Marion Lawrence, Toledo, O.; Hon. T. R. Sweet, Topeka, Kan.; W. A. Duncan, Syracuse, N. Y.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—Bishop Holly of the Episcopal church in Hayti is a colored man, who studied theology while working at a shoemaker's bench in Philadelphia.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

CHICAGO.

A man named McGinnis threw a bottle of nitro-glycerine into a vacant lot at Van Buren and Dearborn streets, Chicago, Sunday night, causing an explosion which broke several windows and frightened the people generally. On examination it was found that the perpetrator of the act was irresponsible, and innocent of intentional mischief.

Chicago is having her down-town streets cleaned.

The "Silver Jubilee" of the Rev. Dr. E. P. Goodwin, of the First Congregational church, last Sunday, his twenty-fifth anniversary, was an occasion of interest, not only to Congregationalists but to Chicago as a community. Dr. Goodwin is one of the oldest pastors, in term of service, in the city.

An explosion of natural gas in the basement of Donohue & Henneberry's building, Dearborn street, last week, seriously burned nearly a score of firemen, several employes of the firm, and some workmen. A few of them are severely injured, but none fatally so far as known. Among those whose burns are painful is Chief Swenie, of the fire department, who had a narrow escape from the full force of the explosion.

German wine growers and dealers are making great preparations for a display at the Exposition. Already 280 exhibitors are registered, who intend sending 1,600 different samples of wines grown in Baden, Alsace, Hesse, the Rhine provinces, Wurtemberg, under the care of a representative committee of wine growers and dealers from Coblenz and Deidesheim and Bingen and Kreuznach and Mayence.

COUNTRY.

On Sunday, a Cincinnati dispatch reported 3,000,000 tons of ice moving down the Ohio river at the rate of five miles an hour. Many river vessels were crushed to splinters by the great glacier, and damage amounting to $300,000 was done.

It is proposed to consolidate the wire, wire rods, and cut nail industries of the United States. The combined capital will be $25,000,000.

At Topeka, Kan., on Friday, Francis Key Brooke, pastor of Trinity church (Episcopal), at Atchison, was consecrated bishop of Oklahoma, with his residence at Guthrie. This was the first consecration of a bishop that has taken place west of the Mississippi river. Bishop Brooke is a relative of Francis Key, the author of "Star Spangled Banner".

The first annual banquet of the Prohibitionists of Northern Illinois was held in Rockford on January 2, and the attendance was so large that 100 persons were unable to gain admission. The visitors came from all over the State, and the spread was an elaborate one. Music was furnished by the Wheaton College quartet. This occasion was noteworthy because they had no wine.

One hundred cases of typhus fever have been reported to the health authorities of New York City. The localities occupied by cheap lodging houses are most affected. Every precaution is being taken to prevent the spread of the disease.

It is stated that fourteen deaths have occurred in the penitentiary at Little Rock, Ark., all due, it is claimed, to the filthy condition of the institution. By some it is claimed that the disease is a contagious one.

The past week has been distinguished by great storms on the ocean and lakes, and in several States blizzards and snow storms, cold weather and the usual accompanying suffering. The severity of the present winter has not been equaled in the Northwest for several years.

About thirty men were slain last week, in a fight between a sheriff's posse and a mob of lynchers at Bakersville, N. C. The cause of the trouble was the determination of the mob of influential citizens to take Calvin Snypes, the murderer of Isaac Osborne, from the jail and hang him, and the opposition to such course entertained by the sheriff of the county. Shortly after midnight the jail was surrounded by a mob numbering nearly 100 armed men, who demanded that Snypes be delivered to them. The sheriff, who had been expecting an attack, had sworn in twenty-five deputies, and notified the leaders of the mob that not only would he not give up the prisoner, but that he was prepared to defend him against any attack. At this the jail was fired upon, and a pitched battle that lasted for nearly half an hour followed, and resulted in the utter rout of the sheriff's force, which retreated, leaving eleven men dead upon the field. The mob lost heavily in the struggle, but rallied and then captured Snypes and brutally murdered him.

The United States mint is now turning out 20,000 of the Columbian exposition souvenir half-dollars daily.

Mrs. Martha J. Lamb, one of the most remarkable women of this country, is dead. She was born at Plainfield, N. J., in 1829, and received an education in the languages and history that was especially limited in those days. In 1852 she was married to Charles A. Lamb, of Ohio. For eight years she lived in Chicago, and was prominent in philanthropic affairs. Since 1866 she has made New York her home. She wrote several works of fiction and children's books, but her best fame will always rest upon her "History of New York City". Of late years she has edited the Magazine of American History.

On New Year's day a young farmer named Garber, living fifteen miles west of Fort Scott, Kan., having learned that his wife and his brother-in-law, Charles Kirby, loved each other, traded his wife to Kirby for a horse. The neighbors learned of the transaction, went to Kirby's house in a body and ordered him to send Mrs. Garber away. This he did, under threats of being tarred and feathered. Garber married the girl, who is but 17 years old, in Sedalia a year ago, and Kirby sent her back to that city.

HOME AND HEALTH.

NURSING THE SICK.

It is true that some have no natural skill or sympathy with this part of a woman's duty, and will probably never make great attainments in this line. But all the more reason that, by early training and unwearied and patient drilling, mothers should endeavor that their daughters should so far attain unto the principles of good nursing that the sick who may be thrown into their care when they are mistresses of families shall not absolutely suffer from neglect and ignorance, or go through the slow starvation that must be their doom if surrounded by those who are heartless through ignorance, and from not understanding some of the simplest rules of nursing. We once heard an old lady say that true economy was a gift of God. However that may be, it does seem that the true art of caring for the sick and feeble is an unmistakable talent—God-given. One can easily tell if persons have the instinctive talent for nursing by seeing them for a few moments in a sick-room, or by the side of one just entering the convalescent stage. It is torture, particularly to those much reduced by long illness—weak and almost childish through great exhaustion—to have a certain class of persons near them. The rustle of a silk dress—which should never be heard in the sick-room anyhow—is to one very weak almost unendurable. Loud talking, sympathy expressed in an off-hand way, because the caller thinks it the proper thing to do, but which has no heart in it; and a long list of inquiries, rapidly uttered, with no pause between for an answer: "What's the matter? What does the doctor say? Have you any appetite? What could you relish most—a little soup? some broth? a good bit of hot steak?" etc. All this rattled off in a way that irritates and rasps the nerves like the filing of a saw. With transient callers one can bear it, because such calls are not often long. But if this were the usual tone of every day, from those on whose care the sick person is thrown, it would be intolerable. However, there is a drop of comfort and some compensation in every dark corner. Usually those who have no sympathy with the sick or talent for nursing them are not often tempted to enter the room. Yet there are those who, when with the sick, appear instinctively to understand just what to do or say. We know a little girl who is a natural nurse, and who will sadly change, or our judgment be proven greatly at fault, if when she arrives at womanhood she is not always a good angel in any sick room into which she may be called to enter. We have seen her step softly to the side of one just emerging from severe illness, lay her little hand on the fevered brow, hold the hot hand a few moments, then quietly wet her nice little handkerchief and, without one word, quietly bathe the hot face and hands so softly and gently as if soothed by a fairy's touch. Finding the heat subside a little, which she seemed quick to notice—still no words spoken but the thanks of the patient—she softly leaves the room, to return with a tiny glass of ice-cold lemonade and smilingly offers it to the parched lips. Time and time again we have had the opportunity of watching this little ministering spirit in her quiet work, and felt she would grow up to be a source of great comfort to many.—Anonymous.

THE DEATH KISS.

This means, for the purpose for which we wish to use it, "kissing the dead". This revolting custom, to which too many yield in their affectionate devotion to the deceased loved one, possesses danger to which every physician should call the attention of the public. The body of a person who has died of disease—whether of a distinctly contagious disease or not—is not a wholesome object. How often have we seen an entire family lingering around the coffin and repeatedly kissing the beloved features still in death and already beginning nature's process of slow dissolution; and how many subsequent cases of sickness have we thought might be traced to that at least a contributory cause. On this subject the London correspondent of the American Lancet gives the following information:

"It is reported that the Servians have a curious custom of giving a parting kiss to their deceased friends before final burial, and the observance of it has caused a serious epidemic of diphtheria. The police Prefect of Belgrade has accordingly issued stringent orders against the custom; prohibiting it for the present, however, only in the cases of those persons who have died from that malady."—Medical World.

With anything that will wash at all, Pearl-line will save you something in the washing. FARM NOTES.

FOOD VALUE OF COARSE FODDERS.

As to why straw is so valuable a fodder, Dr. G. C. Caldwell, the well-known and able professor of chemistry of Cornell University Agricultural College, says: "I have not much faith in calculations based on Wolff's German estimates of the comparative value of the digestible parts of coarse fodders; nor do the Germans themselves make much use of such calculations, so far as I am aware. Taking the much more recent schedule of valuation of fodder constituents adopted provisionally at the Connecticut experiment station, and which does not take the digestibility into account at all, for the reason that our knowledge of that is not yet sufficiently established, I find that oat straw has 77 per cent of the value of average meadow hay, and wheat straw 70 per cent. That is to say, if we take the quantity of hay that is worth $100 for feeding purposes, the same quantity of oat straw would be worth $77 and of wheat straw $70. But then all such calculations must be tested for a time by actual trial; and till so tested and confirmed they can be regarded as only suggestive of relative values."—Colman's Rural World.

GOOD TEAMS AND GOOD FARMING.

These naturally go together, and indeed are indissoluble in most sections of the country. Some one pertinently says it is truer now than ever before that no good farming is possible without good working horses. Their original cost is much greater, but it is only by their help that the full advantage of efficient help can be realized. Good farmers are the first to realize this. If the farmer be himself lazy and inefficient, he will naturally conclude that it does not matter much what kind of horses he works with. And we are not wholly sure he is not half right in this conclusion. Hence, when we see a farmer plowing or doing other farm work with an old, inefficient, and perhaps half-starved team, it is proper enough to suppose that such farmer understands his business better than we can tell him, and knows best what kind of a team he wants to keep up with. Of course, the best of teams grow old in time; but a horse's active life is not half or a third that of an efficient man, and when the team gets past doing a full day's work it should be disposed of and another secured that is fully capable. But, if the loss from working inefficient teams were better understood it would be much harder to sell old or poor horses than it is at present.—Anonymous.

THE ONE-HORSE FARMER.

The one-horse farmer has a life-long ambition to gain a reputation for wearing a dirty shirt.

He will alarm the neighborhood by getting up two hours before day; then sit around and not go to work till after sunrise.

He will ride around a week looking for a two-dollar dog.

He will complain of hard times; then tear his pants climbing a fence where a gate ought to be.

He will pay three dollars for a new bridle; then let the calf chew it to pieces before Sunday.

He will get all his neighbors to help in getting a cow out of the bog; then let her die for want of attention.

Stock will get in and destroy his crop at a place in the fence that he has put off fixing for six months.

He will sprain his back lifting something to show how strong he is.

He will talk all day Sunday on what he knows about farming; then ride around the neighborhood on Monday hunting seed potatoes.

He will go in his shirt sleeves on a cold day to show how much he can stand; then return home at night and occupy two-thirds of the fireplace till bedtime.

He will ridicule the mechanism of a cotton-planter, and then go out and mash his thumb nailing a board on the fence.

He will go to town on Saturday and come back with fifty cents' worth of coffee, a paper of pins, and a dollar's worth of chewing tobacco.

NEWS OF THE WEEK (Continued from 13th page).

Among cases decided by the United supreme court, last week, was one of particular interest to the States of Illinois and Iowa, as it fixed the boundary line between them, and of general interest because it establishes that the middle of a river is the middle of the main channel rather than the middle of that portion of the river bed covered by water. The case was brought by the State of Iowa against the State of Illinois, and grew out of a failure to agree as to what portion of each of the many railway bridges connecting the States should be credited to each on the tax roll.

The settlement of the Oregon contest makes it possible to give an accurate table of the vote for President as it should be cast by the electoral college and which will show: Total number of votes, 444; necessary to a choice, 223; Cleveland's majority, 108. The total votes for the respective candidates is as follows: Cleveland, 276; Harrison, 144, and Weaver, 24.

The San Juan river, the scene of the present search for gold, rises in the San Juan mountains, in Colorado, runs southwestward into New Mexico, and empties into the Colorado river in Utah. The old Californian excitement of 1850 has almost been renewed. Thus far the speculators and provision dealers only have reaped a harvest.

States which are to elect United States Senators this month are: California, Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, Kansas, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming. In several of these States the result, as between parties, is uncertain.

A dispatch from Little Rock, Ark., Jan. 3, says that whether the cause be cholera or poison, convicts confined in the penitentiary continue to die off at an alarming rate. Not a day goes by that one victim is not claimed by death, while frequently two or three pass beyond the reach and need of human pardon for their offenses. One dead and two dying was the official record on that day. Local officers have become alarmed and have ordered the commissioner of health to make an inspection of the prison and report of its condition daily.

New York City is afflicted with typhus fever, which continues to spread, and the board of health is almost powerless to cope with the disease. Twenty fresh victims of the plague were found Jan. 4, making the total number of cases discovered since Dec. 1 eighty-four, of which ten have resulted in death. Tramps, it is reported, are carrying the epidemic into all quarters of the city.

At St. Louis, New Year's morning, a butcher observed a Negro emerge from the rear of his ice-chest, carrying an overcoat, which he had stolen. With the assistance of several other butchers, he soon captured the robber. A policeman was sent for and in the meantime the thief was locked up in an ice-chest for safe keeping, and from it he was taken nearly frozen to death.

Arrivals of vessels at the port of New York last year were 17,296, against 17,771 in 1891—a decrease in 1892 of 475.

Gilbert Asheville Pierce, or as he is familiarly spoken of by his associates, "Gil" Pierce, who was last week nominated as minister to Portugal, is now editor and part proprietor of the Minneapolis Tribune, and formerly one of the editors of the Inter Ocean.

Mrs. Mary E. Lease, of Kansas, has put an end to her candidacy for the United States Senate. A letter to Chairman Bredenthal of the People's party State central committee, contains her withdrawal.

Citizens of Cherry Vale, Kan., are excited over a strike of natural gas there. On Tuesday evening a fine flow was struck, and the flames rose in the air to a height of many feet and burned strong and steadily.

The business reviews of the year just closed show conclusively that prosperity has been the rule in the United States, while dullness has prevailed to a greater or less extent in Europe. The Republicans claim it as a "protection" triumph.

A Milwaukee dispatch states that at the recent bicycling races in that city some of the principal contestants were too drunk to ride creditably.

One hundred and seven alleged heirs of George Rapp, founder of the Harmony community, whose leader, Father Henry, recently died, are ready to break into the society with legal crowbars and rifle it of its millions, amounting, by the thrift of these simple Economites, to perhaps $20,000,000.

The Carnegie mills at Homestead, Pa., are again at work and are running full in every department. The halls of the main office were crowded all day Thursday with men in search of employment, and most of them got what they desired.

General Halbert E. Paine, an ex-member of Congress from Wisconsin, met with a serious accident at Washington, D. C., sustaining a compound fracture of the leg. The lower part of the same limb he lost in a fight during the rebellion, at Port Hudson.

A dispatch from Retchitza, on the Dnieper, says that fifteen men were killed by a mine explosion there, January 3.

J. C. Smith, one of the bright and shining Masonic lights of Illinois, not long ago visited Egypt on a sort of Masonic mission. Several other high Masons from Illinois were in company with him, and, together they were passed into the Anglo-Arabic lodges. In one of these, entered on a Sunday night, they found on the altar "their three great lights—the Koran, the square and compasses—a clear case of 'obliging a Mason to be of the religion of the country,' avoiding all sects and divisions"—doing at Rome as the Romans do; in Cairo as the Egyptians do, and "in Buffalo as the buffaloes do." Masonic religion is very easy-going; it endorses the Bible, the Koran, the Zend Avesta, or the worship of Baal.

We give place, to-day, to the able address, by Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason, before the recent New England District Anti-Secrecy Convention—"Masonry from a Woman's Standpoint." Next week (D. V.), we purpose to follow it with Miss E. E. Flagg's equally interesting address before the same convention—"Woman's Place in Reforms." These two papers are not only strong arguments against the secret lodge system, but testify quite as strongly in favor of allowing women to become reformers—a doctrine that is extremely repugnant to a large number of grannies in masculine habiliments.

The advocates and opponents of Sunday closing of the Columbian Exposition, last week, had an opportunity to address the Congressional committee having in charge the proposed new legislation on this subject. Strong delegations were present from both parties, and arguments in favor of shutting the Fair gates on the Lord's day were ably advanced by Rev. Joseph Cook, Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, and others. This may be considered the most important struggle of the session, for relatively the reputation and integrity of the United States as a nation is involved in the result. In the meantime Christians everywhere have a duty to perform in praying and working for the sanctity of the American Sabbath.

Representative Wilson, of Sangamon county, Illinois, has prepared a bill for consideration of the Legislature, which provides that marriage licenses hereafter shall issue to such persons only as can fulfill these requirements and conditions: That they can read and write in the English language, or if foreigners, that they can read and write in their native tongue; that they are sound physically as well as mentally, and that they do not have any fatal disease lingering in their system by inheritance or acquired by their own vicious or dissipated habits; that the male person desiring to contract marriage give satisfactory evidence that he is engaged in some honorable vocation from which he derives sufficient income to support a home economically. This measure has much merit, if it can be enforced.

We make room, to-day, for the program of the Illinois State Anti-Secrecy Convention, under the auspices of the National Christian Association. It will be held in the Covenanter church (General Synod), at Coulterville, on Tuesday and Wednesday next. Three of the four churches in that place are opposed to secret societies, which makes it a favorable location for our work. Coulterville is about forty-five miles southeast of St. Louis, on the Cairo Short Line and the Chester and Centralia railroads. Delegates will be furnished with good entertainment. Let as many go as can. The exercises will be full of interest.

The Philadelphia Public Ledger of Jan. 6 contains a notice of the death by heart-failure of a middle-aged man in that city, who was a member of the following secret, benevolent and political societies: Philo Lodge, No. 444, F. and A. M.; Keystone Royal Arch Chapter, No. 175; Philadelphia Commandery, No. 2; Lu Lu Temple; Kensington Council, No. 5; Jr. O. U. A. M.; Plato Senate, No. 17, O. S.; Philadelphia Musical Association; Star of America Lodge, No. 52, I. O. O. F.; Sixth Ward Republican Club; Sixth Ward Executive Committee; Apollo Orchestra; The Teachers' Annuity and Aid Association of Philadelphia; Great Senate, No. 17, of Sparta, and the Washington Council, American Legion of Honor. The correspondent who sends us this item thinks that it is no wonder that the man died of heart-failure.

"OUTSIDE THE DOOR"—MASONRY FROM A WOMAN'S STANDPOINT.

ADDRESS OF MRS. M. ELLA A. GLEASON, AT THE NEW ENGLAND ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

"Because the Lord hath been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously; yet is she thy companion and the wife of thy covenant."—Malachi 11:14.

Strange text, you may say, from which to sermonize on such a subject as secret societies; but if we will candidly consider the matter, with Freemasonry as a basis, we may conclude that in many ways an adhering member of these societies has broken the covenant made with the wife of his youth. Jesus saith: "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." Yet in numberless ways the oaths which a man takes, and the covenant which he makes with these idols, put the wife down from the high position which God designed her to occupy, and give her the second or third place in his affections, thoughts, yea, life itself.

"Thou hast thus dealt treacherously with the wife of thy youth," for thou (Freemason) sayest to her in the language of the Freemasons, from whom I quote: "We declare that while as Masons we make no unnatural reservation between husband and wife, sharing no blessings among ourselves from which our beloved partners are debarred; seeking for no gratification or advantage but such as will enable us to make them happier; yet there must be, not only in the constitution of Masonry, but in the very constitution of the sexes, in their different spheres of action, in their different tastes, capacities and temptations—there must be, and there is, a history for each which the other is forbidden to know and which nothing but an unclean curiosity ever induces the desire to know. Practically this is well understood in every domestic circle."

The mixture of falsehood and sophistry contained in these utterances, comes well from the

ANTI-SECRET STATE CONVENTION.

Members of the National Christian Association and all friends of Anti-Secrecy Reform are hereby invited to attend and participate in the approaching State Convention in behalf of the cause:

ILLINOIS

The Illinois State Convention, in opposition to secret societies, and in the interests of other radical Christian reforms, will be held in COULTERSVILLE, RANDOLPH COUNTY, TUESDAY AND WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24TH AND 25TH.

Tuesday, 7:30 P. M. Devotional exercises, by Rev. W. J. Smiley, Sparta.

Rev. J. L. Chesnut, of the Covenanter church, will make the address of welcome, and Rev. D. H. Coulter, D.D., of Winchester, Kan., will respond, speaking of the multiplication of secret orders and their significance. Song by the Glee Club. Appointment of Committees.

Wednesday Morning, Jan. 25.—9:45 A. M. Devotional exercises, by Rev. J. C. Elliott, Swanwick. Discussion of Resolutions.

Wednesday Afternoon, 1:45 P. M. Devotional exercises, by Rev. R. E. Wilkin, Tilden.

"False Religions," by Rev. R. C. Monteith, Coulterville.

Wednesday Evening, 7:30 P. M. Devotional exercises, by Rev. M. A. Gault, Blanchard, Iowa. Among the addresses and speakers already selected are the following:

"The Lodge a Supplanter," by Rev. C. M. Ritchie, Oakdale.

"What Loyalty to Christ Demands," by Mrs. J. M. Sloane, Oakdale.

"Importance of the Anti-Secrecy Reform," by Rev. N. A. Whitehill, Sparta.

"Christless Politics Born of Christless Lodges," by Rev. R. C. Reed, Houston.

"Basis of all Reforms," by Rev. D. B. Faris, Sparta.

"Jesuitism a Foe of the Republic," by Rev. R. W. Chesnut, Marissa.

"Safeguards of Home," by Mrs. R. C. Monteith, Coulterville.

"False Claims of Secret Orders," by Rev. J. K. Montgomery, Sparta.

"Why I do not Belong to a Secret Order," by Rev. J. R. Wylie, Coulterville.

It is hoped that Rev. B. Carradine, D.D., of St. Louis, may be secured for an address.

Music for the Convention will be provided by the Coulterville Glee Club.

Coulterville has three strong anti-secret churches, and will provide ample entertainment for all delegates. It has two railroads, is easily reached from all directions, and is surrounded by the strongest anti-secret sentiment of any town in the State.

lips of a Freemason, fully illustrating his life and the treatment which he accords the one who should be the partner in all his joys and sorrows; the one of whom Christ said, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh." I said, the mixture of falsehood and sophistry—falsehood, because in the light of God's teaching there is no natural reservation between this twain made one flesh; how then can he say, "We make no unnatural reservation"? "Sharing no blessings among ourselves from which our beloved partners are debarred." Scores of Freemasons have said to me, "If I live up to my Masonic obligations I shall be fitted to, and shall, enter heaven." If this deepest of sacrilege be true, the wives of Freemasons are debarred from the greatest blessing accorded to mankind; if this sacrilege be true, then wives of Freemasons are debarred not only from the full companionship of their husbands here, but through all eternity: for, according to Dr. Oliver of the Church of England, high in authority among Masons, "Even the heavens shall pass away, with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up; but Masonry, pure and uncontaminated with earthly abominations, shall triumph over the general and universal dissolution, and shall cement the hosts of heaven in a holy union and communion to all eternity." Verily we must exclaim, with the writer of old, "Much initiation hath made Dr. Oliver mad." Where shall be the woman's heaven when the "good and true" are gathered in the grand lodge above, "called from labor to rest by the Supreme Architect of the universe"?

And if the teaching of Freemasonry be false, and there is "none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved," where shall be the heaven of those who, while professing to believe in this name above every name, give their oaths, allegiance and themselves generally to a religious organization which "gathers around her altars not only the men of every clime—Christian, Jew, Mahometan and heathen, all who are willing and worthy to join the league of brotherly love—but every sect and every party of each. And he who thinks that Masonry can harmonize all these, till they shall come together for a common government, a common creed, would give her superhuman power. No, no. The follower of Mahomet leaves his turban and his crescent at the door; the Christian takes his Jewish brother by the hand, and, leaving without the emblematic cross which separates their faith, they approach the shrine of Masonry together, and bow before the altar of Jehovah, the common God of all." O my Masonic brother, when will you allow Christ to open your eyes to behold the Satanic origin of Freemasonry, which, while telling the Entered Apprentice he must believe in God, the Supreme Master of the universe, allows him to believe in any god denying the Bible, if you choose (I quote from J. P. Bland, a writer of Masonic literature): "There is one common ground on which all good Masons can harmoniously stand—one view in which they can all agree; that is, to accept that in the Bible which enforces the sublime principles of our order, and leave the rest, which to us, as Masons, is non-essential, for each brother to think and believe about as seemeth to him true and good. Thus, men of every religious sect and denomination, and all good men of no sect and denomination, can consistently meet on this broad and common ground. As Freemasons, they all find taught in the Bible the sublime and glorious principles of our order; and, as such, laying aside all doctrinal differences, they can lovingly unite on this common Biblical ground, and work and live together as one. In like manner, any good man who has no special faith in, or regard for, the Bible, can, at least to this extent, conscientiously accept and endorse its teachings, and be of and for us also."

Chase, in his Digest of Masonic Law, page 207, settles the question by declaring "The Jews, the Chinese, the Turks, each reject either the New Testament or the Old, or both; and yet we see no good reason why they should not be made Masons. In fact, Blue Lodge Masonry has nothing whatever to do with the Bible. It is not founded on the Bible. If it was it would not be Masonry; it would be something else." In Mackay's Lexicon on Religion we read: "The religion, then, of Masonry is pure theism, on which its different members engraft their own peculiar opinions; but they are not permitted to introduce them into the lodge, or to connect their truth or falsehood with the truth of Masonry." And you, evangelical church-member, Masonic brother, because you have heard that somewhere in Freemasonry the name of the Saviour is used, are blind enough to think you are worshiping him in a Masonic lodge, when, in order to associate with "all good men and true," you must leave without your belief in the cross (which separates your faith). Truly, with most consummate art has his Satanic Majesty woven a little truth with unmeasurable falsehood, and by a crafty use of the terms God, Christ and religion he is entangling thousands in a confused, eager, feverish search for more light—the light which never comes but in the one way, through Christ, and is allowed to women as well as men. Poor, foolish mortal, struggling for light! And for fear he may in some way escape from the meshes tightening around him, he must swear "always to conceal and never to reveal"; forgetting that "Then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming; even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved."

But men were ever easily deceived, and even

"Now, when time has made the imposture plain,
Some new delusion charms their cheated eyes again."

This Masonic husband, who has taken upon himself the most solemn vows, in regard to the wife, that God ever sanctioned, yet places the vows of Masonry higher; and, while he has promised to love, honor and cherish her, will allow the door of his lodge to separate them eternally, and will entertain remarks concerning woman which are certainly not calculated to raise her in his estimation. Says Robert Morris (referring to the plan of Loges d'Adoption, patronized by Josephine, when wife of the first Consul Bonaparte):

"I do not ask that the doors of our chartered lodges should be thrown open to females. The terms of admission, the preparation and the reception, forbid the Mason granting such a privilege to woman, however exalted or deserving. Whatever key to the world's mysteries and to life's treasures may be entrusted to her, the key of the lodge room is eternally denied her; its doors are eternally barricaded against her entrance.

"Her light footstep may thrill upon our hearts, but we must hear it outside the door."

"Her soft voice may arouse passionate emotions within us, as she pleads for aid outside the door."

"The sunshine of her presence may, and shall, penetrate our walls, and warm our hearts in charity, as she shines upon us outside the door."

"But her sphere is in the heavens; ours within the lodge. And though her light and warmth may reach us, her form cannot enter. Then ask not, sweet voice, for we cannot grant this boon. Seek not, dear form, for you never can pass these portals. Knock not, soft hands, for our inexorable guardian is steeled against your approach. Disgraced amongst the world's holiest, and traitors to the highest sense of obligation, we should be as unworthy of your notice as of the companionship of our own brethren, were we thus to betray our trust."

How long shall women be hoodwinked by such soft talk as this, which really means "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther"? How long shall we tacitly consent to this plan of salvation, made by man for himself, and continue our prayers that the husbands may feel the drawing of the Holy Spirit and acknowledge the only Saviour of mankind, when, in order to live up to his Masonic covenant, he must leave the emblematic cross, which separates their faith, outside the door, and fellowship, in close religious bonds, with all who deny the existence of a Christ.

Poor, deluded man, with Christ and woman outside the door! What must be the condition of him who withdraws himself from the true fellowship of these two, and surrenders himself to the teaching found within the mystic circle?

And yet a Masonic editor has the effrontery to exclaim, "Beware of the man who declares that he renounced Freemasonry because he could not be a Mason and a Christian. He either is most sadly self-deceived or a base hypocrite." Why, the institution itself teaches hypocrisy, allowing its votaries to pass as Christians outside the door and forcing them to deny Christ upon entering, in order to associate with the brethren who are all good men and true. This they must do; for we are told by J. H. Drummond, called a veteran expert in Ancient Craft Masonic Correspondence, "Masons, and those intending to be Masons, should understand that the law of the Grand Lodge is the law of Masonry; and if they cannot obey that law, whether it seems to them right or wrong, reasonable or unreasonable, they had better get out of the institution as soon as possible, as they certainly do not belong in it."

Bro. Drummond also upholds us in our assertion that a professed follower of Jesus leaves him outside the door. He writes: "A Christian can pray only in the name of Christ; a Hebrew cannot pray in his name; while there should be no petition in a Masonic prayer to which Christian and Hebrew cannot alike say 'amen,' each must be allowed to approach Deity in the only manner which he conscientiously believes to be according to the law of God. And certainly such appellations as Grand Architect, Supreme Ruler of the Universe, offend no one, mean nothing to a Christian, and prove the assertion that 'Freemasonry is a religion which recognizes the good teaching of the Vedas, the Zend Avesta, the Talmud, the Five Volumes, the Holy Bible and the Koran.'"

A Western Freemason remarked to me, "I cannot understand why you so emphasize the separation of husband and wife by our order. We have Freemasonry for females." If I had not been so extremely in earnest in my presentation of the subject, such a remark would have been ludicrous; for Adoptive or Female Freemasonry has no connection whatever with Universal Freemasonry. It is simply a sop thrown to those women who may rebel at the separation from husbands—a separation strengthened by horrid oaths and the secrets which he possesses, with thousands of others, which he has sworn he will not tell his wife.

The explanation of the five degrees which may be conferred upon the daughters, wives, widows, sisters and mothers of Master Masons in good standing, and Master Masons themselves, time will not permit me to give you; but you may obtain the book and read for yourself, at a small expense. To give you an idea of how much these favored females really know about the order, we quote from the preliminary address by the instructor, who is a man: "To you are given all the advantages of the society—its shield of protection, its hand of relief and its voice of sympathy; while we do not require of you any of the labor or expense of sustaining it. [This last sentence is a polite way of saying, 'You cannot associate with your husband in our lodge; and as we have taken so much of his money that belongs to you, you surely have none to give us.'] The only Masonic privilege denied to you is that of visiting the lodge; and this would be of no advantage to you, even if it were possible to grant it; but it would awaken the voice of scandal against you from a censorious world, and thus produce far more pain to your kind and amiable hearts than it could possibly afford you pleasure. Females cannot be made Masons. This is a rule that has been handed down with the other rules of Masonry for thousands of years. Each Mason present pledged himself, before he was admitted into the lodge, that he would never allow any of the ancient rules of Masonry to be changed; and this is one of them." Pledged himself to something he knew nothing about! "It would awaken the voice of scandal against you." Why! why would it be a disgrace for wives to go with their husbands, night after night, so often until the "wee sma' hours," where the husband, we are told, is being made better, wiser and happier? Better, for "Masonry teaches morality, virtue, temperance, economy, charity and justice to all men; wiser, for it imparts knowledge to them that is weighty, solemn and important—knowledge that has been handed down to them from age to age for nearly 3,000 years; happier, for it makes them acquainted with, and puts them in social connection with, the purest and best men in every section of the country." Surely, if all this be true, what an unpardonable wrong is being committed in keeping these mysteries from the female relations, at least of the Freemasons! for if you will read through the higher degrees of Masonry, what they pretend to teach and the state of perfection to which they raise the candidate, you will readily perceive that poor, sinful woman can have no part or lot with this "wise, good, happy, true, chivalrous, cultured, self-sacrificing, elevated, large-souled, sublime, reverent, perfect, repentant, redeemed, regenerated member of our order, which time has rendered venerable, which virtue has consecrated, which genius has made immortal."

And yet we find an admission from an article on Freemasonry by an acknowledged authority (Wm. E. Ginther), that these things are not really so. Bear with me a few moments until I come to it; for we cannot, in a moment, discover what these grand symbols and mysteries really lead to, with the high-flown language, metaphor and simile. We, being women, cannot fathom the depths and bring to light the purity, the beautiful, the sublime; but I see there are men present, and some may have passed and been raised up to a sublime and ancient degree. To them we may apply for aid in unraveling the mysteries—but no, we are women; and a woman may not know Masonry, "because she is not a man."

Wm. Ginther writes: "A lodge consists of a certain number of Free and Accepted Masons duly assembled, with the Holy Bible, square and compasses, and a charter or warrant empowering them to work." Abstractedly from person, a spiritual lodge, in its least form, consists of a state of regeneration in one man here called a Mason. In a general form it consists of the same state in an indefinite number of Masons. Personified, it consists of a society of Masons who are in that state. This exists from the good of love, and truth of faith, in a life of charity, which make up the three discreet degrees designated by the words, 'Ancient, Free and Accepted'; because good of love is primary, and therefore ancient; the truth of faith makes all good men free; and all who practice both in a life of charity are accepted of the Lord." Now for the admission: "It should be borne in mind, however, that this does not mean that all Masons so-called are good and true, but that they represent these qualities; for Masonry is symbolical."

Now, we understand the meaning of the remark quoted in the beginning of the address—"If I live up to the teaching of Freemasonry, I shall be fitted to, and may, enter heaven." No, no, brother, the sublime word which shall cause the pearly gates to swing wide for your entrance is not Freemasonry, but Christ. "He saves, and he alone."

"God may have other words for other worlds,
But for this world the word of God is Christ,
And when we come to die, we shall not find
The day has been too long for any of us
To have fulfilled the perfect law of Christ.
Who is there that can say, 'My part is done
In this; now I am ready for a law
More wide, more perfect, for the rest of life?
Is any living that has not come short?
Has any died that was not short at last?'"

In this age, when woman is called to serve Christ as never before, in more ways than ever before; when she is called to active service, to do and dare as never before; when the Holy Spirit is preparing her as she has never been prepared, it is fitting that she stand ready, "an empty vessel for the Master's use made meet," not entangled with the yoke of bondage. But, you say, there is nothing about real Freemasonry in these degrees which are conferred upon women—none of the false worship, none of the terrible oaths. Very well; but to belong to any part or annex of an evil thing is to aid and uphold the evil itself; and "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth." And "He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God-speed; for he that biddeth him God-speed is partaker of his evil deeds."

O my sisters, in the light of the inspired utterance, "For what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband?" let us lay aside every weight; let us be honest, as in God's sight, in regard to this matter; let us be willing to hear and investigate for ourselves; let us ask ourselves, in the face of the assertion that "no woman can be a Mason because she is not a man," where is woman's God, if Masons stand by the following utterance from one of their number? "The soul of man, in leaving this vale of tears, first returns in thought to the everglades of childhood, that it may depart, purified by visions of peace, from the world's cares. So let us, in our determination to perform our vows, purify our hearts; and when we trust, let us trust in Him who is the foundation-stone of a Mason's theology." And where is woman's salvation when, "Before a man can be made a Mason, i. e., enter into a covenant with his Maker, it is necessary that he meet with obstructions, that he may be duly examined as to his qualifications in the art and science of the Ancient Craft," etc.? And where is woman's heaven, when we read, "He, therefore, who wears the lambskin, as the badge of a Mason, i. e., he who lets innocence rule the thoughts and acts of his daily life, is thereby continually reminded of that purity of life and conduct which is so essentially necessary to his gaining admission into the celestial lodge above, where the Supreme Architect of the Universe presides?"

Women, let us not be deceived. "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is the way of death." "Understanding is a wellspring of life unto him that hath it; but the instruction of fools is folly."

Let us not waste time over the question, as to how far "females have privileges in connection with Masonry, and how they can make themselves known when among strangers or in distress," but let us put our trust in the God of heaven and earth, who hath said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee"—it matters not whether we be wives, mothers, sisters, daughters of Masons—with a firm belief in that One, whom to know is life eternal. "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds; casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God."

"O woman! crowned with righteousness!
The scepter of this land is thine to wield.
Rise, save and bless!
Let wisdom heal man's babel strife,
And bring to earth celestial life."

MOST IMPORTANT MISSION WORK.

BY REV. M. A. GAULT.

A dear young brother, ambitious to labor in the foreign mission field, wants to know if there is any reason to doubt the Lord's call to that work. I offer for his consideration, and for that of all others whose minds are similarly exercised, these thoughts:

No earnest Christian can doubt that it is the Lord's will to have missionaries go to the foreign field. The missionary spirit is leading Christians to enter this field as never before; and it must be confessed that this desire to go to foreign lands is stronger in the large Presbyterian and Methodist churches than in the reform churches. And is not the hand of God in this? These large, popular and wealthy churches have all the means necessary to do this work. They have the wealth to organize and maintain the most powerful missionary machinery. Their missionaries are qualified to teach the elementary principles of Christianity. Those in heathen lands are not prepared to receive the higher principles of Christianity, such as the application of Bible principles to civil government. Besides, these heathen nations have not enough of good in them to warrant the organization of any movement for their reformation.

This foreign missionary work belongs chiefly to those churches who refuse to work for the reformation of our own land. No wide-awake Christian can fail to see that secret lodges and saloons, and national immorality are imperiling the life of our nation. They are destroying more souls in this land than all our foreign missionaries can save. To allow these great evils to go on with their soul-destroying work, while we try to save souls in foreign lands, is to save at the spigot and waste at the bung.

The popular churches of our times do manifest a zeal for foreign missionary work. It absorbs the burden of their interest and contributions. But they will not labor for the reformation of our own land. It is easier to shed tears over the woes of heathenism at a distance than at our own doors.

The mission of reform churches is to save this land from modern heathenism in the form of secret lodges. If I were a member of a time-serving, popular church, largely endowed with wealth and worldly influence, and a church that would not join in the great moral reform battle for the salvation of this land, then, if I had a missionary spirit, I could go to labor in a foreign field. But if my connection was with a reform church, where I would be free to labor in reform work to save my own land, then I certainly feel that this would be the most important and needed missionary work. I cannot but feel that it is a part of Satan's scheme to try to silence the testimony of reform churches by diverting their interest out of the channel of reform work into the channel of foreign missions.

A FRENCH SOCIETY WITH MAFIA METHODS.

Annal Sherman, an overseer in the Walton lumber camp near Ishpeming, Mich., aged about fifty years, was found dead on the 4th inst., with a bullet hole in his breast and a smoking revolver beside him. Gazing stoically at the dead man was a Frenchman named Antony Murray, who has been working in the camp. He explained that Sherman had been sitting quietly by the stove when he suddenly drew a revolver and shot himself. The explanation was regarded with suspicion, but the coroner's jury rendered a verdict of accidental death. Next day, however, an investigation was set on foot that led to sensational revelations. A search of the dead man's clothes disclosed an old and well-worn envelope, inside which was scrawled in French:

"If I, Annal Sherman, come to a violent end charge it to work of 'Paris Terrors.' Ten years ago I violated the society's laws, and have since been pursued by one of its members. He overtook me in San Francisco in 1886 and has followed me here. He is hounding me to death."

Then followed a brief description of his pursuer. A comparison showed that it fitted Murray exactly, and he was at once taken into custody. He refused to talk of the affair at first, but under pressure practically admitted that the crime was his work. He explained that in 1882 Sherman failed to perform a certain task allotted to him, and through the failure two members of the society were guillotined. Since then Sherman has been under the ban of the society, and one of its emissaries has been on his trail. He fled first to London, then to South America, and then spent a year in San Francisco as a salmon fisherman. But his pursuer was not baffled, and Sherman finally hid himself in a lumber camp, where Murray found him two months ago. Murray denies that he did the shooting, and in explanation of the accusation that the revolver with which the shooting was done belonged to him, says that Sherman had borrowed it to kill himself and thus end the dreaded pursuit.

Such is the story related in a special telegram to the Inter Ocean, dated Ishpeming, Jan. 5.

Edgar A. Poe, in his papers on "Cryptology," promulgated the theory that human ingenuity could not construct any cryptograph which human ingenuity could not decipher. Tested by several correspondents with difficult samples of their skill, the poet actually took the trouble to examine and solve them in triumphant proof of the truth of his theory. The same is true of all secret societies: they need not remain secret longer than till some shrewd investigator determines to find them out. No man nor men can invent any esoteric ritual or system that some other man or men cannot fully discover and expose. Strictly speaking, there are no absolutely secret orders in civilized countries. Organizations claiming to be such are fostered in their delusion by the general and wicked indifference of the public, the suicidal warrant and protection of the weak and tottering state, and the toleration and truckling sanction and fellowship of the recreant and rejected nominal church.—Exchange.

WAR ON LABOR UNIONS DECLARED.

The Washington (D. C.) Star of the 9th inst., on the authority of a Cincinnati dispatch, makes the statement that the Pennsylvania railroad company has openly declared war on all organized labor. No longer is there doubt of the road's hostility to the different brotherhoods to which the employes in different departments have attached themselves. Openly the order goes out that the men must sever all connection with organized labor bodies or their names will be erased from the pay rolls of the company. For months the officials have been at work, using persuasive means to diminish the membership of brotherhoods among the force of men in their employ. Lukewarm members renounced their orders.

On Saturday the 8th the crisis was reached, and as the news of the company's action had reached every point on the line there was intense agitation all along it. At Indianapolis Oran Perry, city freight agent, summoned the freight handlers before him, saluting them with the remark:

"All of you who desire to remain with the company, instead of the union, will walk to this side of the room." Fifteen did so, and five refused.

"I do not want to be misunderstood," continued Col. Perry. "This company will not furnish bread and butter to men who are likely to prove unfaithful to it. You cannot be loyal to the company and to your union, and if you prefer the union to the company that pays you your wages, well and good.

"It is not necessary to mince matters. You five men are discharged, and you will get your pay at once. The others can return to work, but they cannot continue to work and belong to the union. This shall not be a union freight house while I am in charge. The company reserves the right to conduct its own business, and while I am doing this of my own accord I am satisfied my superior officers will find no fault with it."

Altogether there were twenty-three union men. Ten were discharged and the remainder with drawn from the union. It leaked out, in connection with the Pennsylvania Central affairs, that where there were nine of the Order of Railway Telegraphers on the Indianapolis division three weeks ago but three are left, and these expect dismissal within twenty-four hours.

Thus it seems evident, says the dispatch, that the edict is far-reaching and will include engineers, firemen, brakemen, conductors, switchmen, and even freight handlers. In other words, every department of labor on the road banding themselves into a body for mutual benefit will be asked to quit their jobs or their secret orders.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

An old-fashioned winter.—Is national faith waning?—Some sudden deaths.—Lodge craftiness.—Yale and the New Haven ministers.—Woman suffrage and the Prohibition party.

Perhaps New England resents the imputation cast upon her of late years, that her climate is changing; and if so, she is certainly doing her best to prove it a vile calumny by giving us one of her thorough-going, old-fashioned winters, such as would have done credit to the days of quilting-bees and singing schools. By the way, I wonder how many people are really appreciative of the beauties of a winter day and a snow-covered landscape. I noted, one morning, going into Boston on the cars when the trees were laden with snow, how few among the passengers seemed to give even a passing glance to the enchantments of that rare, strange, white world through which we were plunging. Men read the morning papers, or lounged listlessly back, with their hats over their eyes, as if all this fairy-like beauty meant nothing to them. I fear the love of dollars and cents is fast crushing out of our national character even the love of natural beauty; and when that goes, a great deal goes with it. Without a keen love of nature, genuine literature is impossible. Does this account for the woefully mediocre poetry in our popular magazines, or the fiction with its dreary "realism" of society small talk? But the loss which our adoration of what Ruskin calls the Goddess of Getting-on entails upon us as a nation, goes farther and deeper than this. Take the recent sneers in the daily press, especially the Boston Herald, at D. L. Moody's belief that prayer saved the steamship Spree. In the days when New England had her great men—her Sumner and Channing, her Emerson and Longfellow—she would have hardly tolerated in her Christian households a paper that made a profane butt of prayer, and, by implication, of all who believe in "that lever which moves the Hand that moves the world". She would, in fact, have found it as difficult to stomach as the popish mummery of the late Columbus celebration. Skepticism and superstition go hand in hand. They are but the positive and negative sides of the same thing; and a long farewell to New England's greatness when, through the supineness of her own sons and daughters, they take the place of her old-time faith!

The death of Prof. Horsford, one of the most munificent patrons of Wellesley, next to its original founder, is a sad loss to the college. He prosecuted his Norumbega researches, which supplied the missing link in New England's pre-historic times, with as much enthusiasm as men ever delved in the buried cities of Greece or Egypt. It was the pure love of historic discovery for discovery's sake. His strong, manly physique went well with his genial face, and his hearty grasp of the hand, which made even a stranger feel as if he was welcoming a newly-found friend. The king of Denmark lately sent him the decoration of a Knight of the Royal Order of Danneberg, an ancient order, founded in the Middle Ages, and bestowed but very rarely. His was a personality, however, too thoroughly genuine to gain anything from these foreign baubles that smaller souls clutch at so eagerly to supplement their own inferiority.

The equally sudden death of Benj. F. Butler emphasizes the fact which few are to fail to notice, that prominent Americans are to-day much more apt to "die in the harness" than they were fifty or seventy-five years ago. The demands of our faster age must be met somehow, and so the machinery is driven at its fastest speed until the vital springs give way suddenly, and one after another distinguished in literature or in politics goes to join "the silent majority". But why cannot the reporters let a man alone in his last hours? There is no saying what heights Maine's dying statesman, James G. Blaine, might have reached with his great endowments, had he only possessed the courage of his convictions and more fortunate environments; but with all the errors and weaknesses which have marked his career he has now reached a place where even his enemies should, for decency's sake, let him alone. The groundless report that he had turned Catholic was spread through the country by that part of the press which, according to Prof. Townsend, has a Jesuit at its elbow, and believed, just as so many other foolish stories are believed, "because the papers say so". But if at the time he was supposed to be at the point of death, Archbishop Gibbons and Priest Ducey actually did visit the Blaine, it shows the craft of Rome in a new and striking light. But speaking of craftiness, there lies before me at this moment an item clipped from some "Rules for lodge members," which reads as follows: "If you have a minister in your lodge, invite him to preach a sermon or deliver a lecture before you in his church. Attend in a body." Rome does not monopolize all the subtlety. Her twin sister, Masonry, being descended from the same Babylonian mother, has inherited her share of it.

Dr. Pentecost has concluded to accept an English pastorate. Therefore Park Street church cannot have him for its minister. I see English pulpits like to get hold of our men of mark, just as American pulpits like to get hold of some of theirs. If it is only a fair exchange it is no robbery, and certainly Dr. Pentecost can hold his own with any English preacher who has yet been called by an American church.

I am glad to see that the Congregational ministers in New Haven have lately sent a joint letter to the Yale Faculty, urging the prohibition of all betting and gambling by the students, especially on foot-ball and other sports. It is no credit to the Faculty that they must be urged to do their duty in this respect. There is no earthly reason why a college of young men cannot be obliged to obey the laws of morality and decency as much as a college of young women; and it should be done, if for nothing else, in the interests of the virtuous and self-respecting class, who, it is to be hoped, far outnumber the others.

Some of the endowment orders yet linger, "like the last leaf on the bough," but very soon even these will have dropped out of sight. The "Order of the Mystic Seven" makes another interesting chapter in their history. The receiver, who has just filed his report, finds that during the two years the order was running, its officers—some of whom have left for parts unknown—appropriated $14,411.22 for their services, and of the thousands of dollars paid in by its dupes only the merest treasurer, has been handed over by the supreme treasurer, and that only when threatened by a legal process.

Mrs. Katherine L. Stevenson, secretary of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U., at a recent Prohibition meeting in Boston, expressed her regret that the younger members of the party seem to be opposed to woman suffrage. That it should be the younger ones who are so opposed, they who ought to be the most radical and progressive, is surely noteworthy; and it behooves such a wise and discerning body of women as the W. C. T. U. to find out the reason for such a peculiar state of things. But may not this be the key to the mystery? The aged veterans of the party, who fought in the anti-slavery conflict, side by side with such women as Lucretia Mott and Abby Kelley Foster, are clear of the lodge, which cannot be said of those whose recollection does not extend beyond the civil war. The influence of the lodge—and it is a most strange and subtle thing—is always and everywhere against giving woman her political rights; and thus it is one of the most efficient allies of the saloon power, and every other evil.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 11, 1893.

President Harrison's Mormon amnesty proclamation is being made the basis for new efforts towards getting the necessary legislation at this session of Congress to make Utah a sovereign State of the Union. It is argued that polygamy was the principal objection to the admission of the Territory, and that the President's proclamation was an official notification to the world that polygamy is no longer practiced in Utah. The remarks of a member of Congress with whom your correspondent talked on the subject were so much to the point that no apology is necessary for quoting them. He said: "The issuing of the proclamation was in itself a just thing to do; it said in effect to the Mormons: The people of this country who are opposed to polygamy are disposed to be generous and accept your promises as to your having forever abandoned polygamy, and as an evidence of their good will towards your reform they pardon all those who have been convicted of the offense. But because they have accepted these promises and granted pardon for past transgressions does not indicate that they are willing to take the Mormons into the bosom of their families until time shall have shown that they have faithfully lived up to their promises. Every good man or woman is ready to take the vilest criminal, who gives evidence of an earnest desire to reform, by the hand and help him along, but no one would be willing to admit him as a member of his or her family until the last vestige of doubt about the genuineness of his reform had vanished. The American Union represents a family, each State being a member, and Utah the reformed criminal. It will be time enough to talk about admitting the reformed criminal to the family circle when he shall have demonstrated to all that his reformation was genuine."

Congress took a long step this week towards assuring the country that every possible precaution will be taken to keep the cholera out of the United States next summer. The Senate passed without a division the Quarantine bill, which puts the control of all matters pertaining to quarantine in the hands of the national government, and gives the President authority to suspend immigration, in whole or in part, whenever he shall deem it necessary to keep out contagious or infectious diseases; also the power to establish quarantine regulations between the States. The same bill is now before a House Committee.

The greatest interest in the hearings before the House Committee on the Columbian Exposition for and against the Sunday closing of the World's Fair, which began yesterday, is being manifested. A large delegation from Chicago, headed by the Mayor of that city, and aided by the Attorney General of Illinois and representatives of the Seventh-day Adventists, the Hebrews, labor organizations, and more than one minister of a church which recognizes the Sabbath as the Lord's day, is here laboring for the adoption of the proposed amendment, allowing the Exposition to be kept open on the Sabbath. The other side is ably represented by ministers of the Gospel, members of the American Sabbath Observance Association, the W. C. T. U., and other religious and moral reform organizations, as well as of the Christian churches of Washington and other cities. The W. C. T. U., besides having a petition presented through Representative Dingley, of Maine, praying that the law be allowed to remain as it is, has asked all Christian people to join in private prayer, each day, until the matter is settled, that the law prohibiting Sunday opening of the Exposition be not repealed. The congregation of Mount Vernon M. E. church joined in a petition to the House of Representatives, asking that the law be not repealed. It is difficult at this time to predict with certainty what the result will be when the question comes before Congress for a final vote, although it is considered certain that the committee before which the hearings are now taking place, of which Representative Duborow, of Chicago, who is a candidate for Mayor of that city, is chairman, will make a report in favor of the opening of the Exposition on Sunday. It does not, however, necessarily follow that Congress will reverse the decision made at the last session because of that report, although there is great danger that the subtle influences now at work upon members may have that result. There is still time, however, for the Christian constituents of wavering Senators and Representatives to influence them to vote the right way, if it be undertaken at once.

Never were the good men and women engaged in alley-mission work doing more good than now, when the continued extremely cold weather is causing an unusual amount of suffering among that class of our population which is dependent upon outdoor work for a support for themselves and families. The missionaries who carry the Bible in one hand and a coal hod or a basket of provisions in the other find many doors opened to them that would otherwise be slammed in their faces.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

NOTTOWAY C. H., Va., Jan. 11, 1893.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Taking advantage of the holiday railroad rates, I ran over to Hampton, on the 27th ult., to visit the training school there. General Armstrong received me very cordially and introduced me to the chaplain, Rev. Mr. Frizzelle, who took me to the library and reading room, which is large and well-furnished. I made arrangements to supply them with some reform literature.

The Hampton Institute is doing a great and much-needed work among the Indian youth. While they are taught in the usual literary course, they are also trained in various mechanic arts. I attended and led the prayer service in the evening, where seven hundred students, of Indian and African descent, met in the chapel to praise and worship God.

The next morning I took passage on the steamer for Norfolk. The snow storm which raged the day before had filled up the tracks of the street-cars, in the city, and put a stop to their running for that day. But I visited Norfolk Mission College all the same. This is an institution sustained by the United Presbyterians to educate the colored youth. The Rev. J. B. Work is at the head of it; and he reports 649 students in all departments the past year, besides a good many who have applied for admission, for whom there was not room. In addition to the large college building, and the residence for the teachers, there is a printing office for job work, where they print a monthly paper called the College Bulletin, edited by A. W. Williams.

Bro. Work is in full sympathy with our anti-secrecy reform and ready to use our literature.

So I furnished him with the Cynosure and a few books for the library.

December 29 I visited the Virginia Normal and Collegiate Institute, at Petersburg. Pres. J. H. Johnston was absent for the holidays; and most of the professors were gone. But I saw some of the members and officers of the Y. M. C. A. and made arrangements to send some anti-secrecy books to their library.

The Institute at Petersburg has a very large college building, occupying a commanding position on a high hill, and is in all respects well furnished. It is an Afro-American college, having a colored president and faculty and seven hundred and thirty-two colored students enrolled. There is, in addition to the literary instruction, some thorough industrial training. The young men are drilled in carpentry and shoe-making, and the young women in sewing and cooking. All the dresses worn at commencement by the senior girls are made by the wearers.

S. F. PORTER.

NEW WORK FOR THE FLOATING CHAPEL.

[Whether the following letter from Bro. I. R. B. Arnold was intended for publication or not, the proposition which it contains is so fully in the line of the anti-secret work of the N. C. A. that we are sure it will commend itself to the sympathy and benevolence of our many friends.—EDITOR CYNOSURE.]

HENDERSON, Ky., Jan. 14, 1893.

I would like to visit the Cynosure office and have a talk with the N. C. A. Can you give me the postoffice address of Bros. Rathbun and Starry? Would it be best to change the floating chapel for a season into a lodge-room, and have Bro. Rathbun or Bro. Starry work the degrees—with a short lecture, and a few pictures each night? If the work should be entered into, it would be best to drive it with a strong hand, and remain only three nights in a place, working the degrees, scattering literature, getting subscribers, etc. Would the friends of the cause contribute enough to sustain a man to work the degrees? I would want no pay myself, or any pay for the use of the chapel.

Such work would be a consumptive, rather than a productive, industry, financially; and I could not afford it—that is, there would not be receipts enough to support Bro. Rathbun. Perhaps his salary could be raised by contributions outside. If we should drop everything else and take up the Anti-masonic work exclusively, we should expect to sell all kinds of anti-secret books.

I do not know that it would be best to drop our various lines of work; but thought I would like to get your opinion, and that of the friends of the cause.

The steam-tug would be an absolute necessity, if we moved every two or three days.

I shall preach to the colored people in Henderson on Sunday.

I have now over $100 for the steamer. Some comes in nearly every day.

Just now the chapel is frozen up in the ice; the river is frozen across, but we keep the ice cut around it.

What is your advice? Shall I continue our general work on many lines, or go exclusively into the Anti-masonic work?

Can it be sustained?

Can Bro. Rathbun or Starry be had for the work?

I. R. B. ARNOLD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A REMINISCENCE.

LODI, Wis., January 7, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—About a quarter of a century ago, just after the dinner hour on a certain Sabbath, a gentleman was about to leave his residence, and the side of his sick wife, to visit his place of business, as he was accustomed to do every Lord's day afternoon.

He was a young merchant of Chicago, of supernatural endowments, fine appearance and kindly manners, but living a purely worldly life, and utterly forgetful of God. On this particular day, the nurse who was in attendance upon his wife, a practical Christian woman, urged him not to go away but remain at home, with his family. His reply was, that to remain on that day was impracticable, because of an appointment that must be met; but he promised that on the following Sabbath he would remain as desired.

The next Sabbath came, and although he at first appeared to have forgotten his pledge, yet when reminded of it by the nurse, he acknowledged it, and yielding at once, remained at home.

Being all seated, husband and nurse by the side of his wife, the nurse proposed that some one should read. He acquiesced and she was requested by him to read aloud. Willingly complying, she opened the Bible at the 23rd chapter of the Gospel by Luke and read aloud to the end of the book.

The gentleman listened intently to that wondrous and solemn account of the trial, rejection and crucifixion of the lowly, patient, spotless Son of man, and then of his resurrection and ascension from Bethany to glory. As he listened, the Holy Spirit fastened the word upon his soul with resistless power, and the tears began to course down those cheeks so unused to weeping, and his sobs broke the stillness of that sacred hour.

Soon question followed question, and the afternoon was largely spent in religious conversation suggested by the passage read, in which the nurse was seconded by the sympathy and aid of the Christian wife.

As time passed on it became apparent that that Sabbath hour, spent beneath the cross of Jesus, was to him the beginning of a new life. From that time the afternoon of the Lord's day was spent at home, and he began to attend the services of the sanctuary, at first occasionally; afterwards constantly.

Death entered the family after a time, and the Lord claimed three of his dear little ones. He began to take an active interest in the affairs of the First Congregational church, under the leadership of Pastor Goodwin, whom he greatly esteemed, and in 1875 he became a member of that church. The remainder of his earnest, busy, useful, Christian career is well known in the city where he lived and died.

The gentleman referred to was Henry N. Hollen, mentioned by the Cynosure as having entered into rest on Dec. 17th; and the aged nurse, now in her 77th year, is still living, and rejoicing to hear of the grace of God so abundantly bestowed upon the once thoughtless and pleasure-loving young man, made by that grace "a prince and a great man in Israel."

Let us learn from this account what one humble Priscilla may do for Christ, if willing to serve in God's way. Let us learn the importance of truth and fidelity in the character with which the Spirit deals for salvation. Here everything seems to have hinged upon the faithful keeping of the promise made to remain at home the day mentioned. And let us learn afresh that "the Word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." May the Holy Spirit teach us to wield this sword aright.

GOSPEL WORK IN SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

CARTHAGE, Mo., —, 1892.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am inclined to think it would interest very many to know something more about Southern California. I have recently returned from our two months' visit to different parts of this Golden State, and have met hundreds and thousands of her people and talked and lectured about the "widow's son" and distributed many books and tracts touching and telling about how a man is made a Mason—and what and how he is put through "neither naked nor clad, neither barefooted nor shod," and how he is brought to light after being in such awful darkness so long.

I have this to say of Los Angeles and California: That I met with less opposition there than in any other place I have ever visited. Truly the harvest is ripe in that part of the State and the laborers are few, for I found hundreds of people very anxious to hear and to read and to know all about the "widow's son."

The city of Los Angeles has the most Christians in it of any city I have ever visited, for since that great and blessed man, Mills, held his meetings there, almost everybody is religious, and the "widow's son" has but little to say, or excuse to make; for when Christ came in, the devil went out, and finds it a very poor city for his operations, as he seems to have been badly defeated. I have never been at any place where such most wonderful signs have followed a revival as that held by Mr. Mills in Los Angeles; but there are hundreds of holy men and women there to help carry forward the grand work among them. I would mention the name of Major Hilton, of the Gospel Mission. He preaches Christ with spirit and boldness, and feeds the hungry. Every Sunday morning he has from one hundred to one hundred and fifty to set down to a free breakfast; after which he boldly preaches to them a blessed risen Christ; and not only this, but he clothes the poor people—all who come to be clothed. In this work he is supported by hundreds of wealthy Christian men and women. Surely God is in it, and a great many find the bread of life and the garments of salvation, and will shine as the stars for ever and ever.

But there are several other missions in the Garden City. The Ferguson mission is also doing a grand work, and, although they do not feed and clothe the body, they do feed the soul, and many there be that are made partakers of the divine nature and will live in a more beautiful city of God.

In San Pedro, on the coast, is a little mission, conducted mostly by good sisters. A Mrs. Taylor is there, from Phoenix, Arizona, telling the great truths of a risen Christ and his power to save; but the greatest thing I have ever seen took place at Long Beach, some eighteen miles from Los Angeles. There was being held a Methodist holiness camp-meeting, presided over by a Bro. Brazee, and in a fine tabernacle that seats twelve hundred, near the sea-shore. I and my wife attended it for nearly two weeks, and it was a continual feast. Here I met a brother, a M. E. minister, who withstood me years ago, in the State of Missouri, for he was a practical Mason, as he had been "raised from a dead level to a perpendicular," and one night after service he came to me and said: "Bro. Glassford, I wish to see you to-morrow morning at the tabernacle;" and we met and he said: "You know I was a Freemason in Missouri, but I have renounced it all." I said: "Bless the good Lord, you can get saved now." "Yes," he replied, "it stood right in my way for years, and I have to say that your terrible and zealous opposition to it I could never forget. It haunted me for years;" so I just said, "bless the Lord for his goodness;" and at this blessed camp-meeting I met hundreds of young men, and some old ones, that wore the compass and square, that I talked with and gave tracts; and many have openly renounced the hidden things of dishonesty.

But the most wonderful thing that I have ever seen took place on the second Monday, during service. In the forenoon, Bro. Brazee had been telling the people that there would be a Pentecostal shower some time during the meeting, and urged all to be present at every service, so as not to miss it. He seemed very confident that there would be a Pentecost; so, on the second Monday morning, while Bro. Fowler was preaching, it did come with great power, so that hundreds of people fell. It seemed to come like a sweeping wind, and nearly the whole congregation went down, although it was a still morning; and all over the ground people lay like dead men. For a few moments all was quiet except the groans of the sinners, but soon the stillness was followed by great shouts of victory and hallelujahs, and no one was heard to ask what it was, for all knew that it was the Spirit of God. It was the Pentecost! Yes, it was the same as when Peter preached and men cried out, "What must we do to be saved?"

Oh, I feel to bless God forever for such fullness for his most unspeakable gift; hundreds testified to the same things, and there were no infidels there. It swept away the refuge of lies, and all believed. It was a poor place for the "widow's son;" and that glad hour many will always remember, rejoicing that there is yet a God that answers by fire, and who sends the Comforter. People will never hear the last of it, for it will be told by hundreds of warm and truthful hearts, and that also will be the means of others receiving like precious faith.

After this I visited Riverside, where I found many Christians, with oranges and orange trees by the millions. It is just immense! There is their Magnolia avenue, sixteen miles long, and kept like a clean garden. It put me in mind of that first Psalm, which speaks of a tree planted by the rivers of water; and in this place is fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah, which says the wilderness shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. Here, too, I found a good opportunity to inquire concerning the widow's son, and found him sick nigh unto death, for Masons had not worn their lamb-skins for over a year. Now, indeed, I feel like singing:

Sowing in the morning, sowing seeds of kindness;
Sowing in the noontide and the dewy eve,
Waiting for the harvest and the time of reaping;
We shall come rejoicing, bringing in the sheaves.
Bringing in the sheaves, bringing in the sheaves;
Yes, we shall come rejoicing, bringing in the sheaves.

LITERATURE.

"OUR MISSIONARY MARTYRS" is the title of a neatly manufactured volume of 310 pages recently issued from the publishing house of T. B. Arnold, 106 Franklin St., Chicago.

It contains memoirs of Mary Louisa Ranf, missionary to India, by Mrs. Mariet Hardy Free-land; Mary E. Carpenter, missionary to Africa, by "one who loved her;" and memorial sketches of Mary E. North, Charles S. Kerwood, Arthur Y. Lincoln, Polly A. Lincoln, Jennie R. Torrence, and Eunice Knapp, all missionaries to Africa. Portraits of nearly all these, skillfully executed, add interest to narratives that are themselves replete with interest.

The missionary fields in all pagan countries are rich in the memorials of faithful and useful Christian lives of those who have laid down and died among those whom they came to save; but this, we believe, is the first complete record of the loved and lost who went out to India and Africa from the Free Methodist church in the United States. They have left behind them glorious records of trust and obedience, of resignation and triumph, with clear-cut and convincing testimonies of the power and comfort of the religion of Jesus Christ; and, although in the providence of God, they now sleep the sleep of the just, their works in behalf of the heathen live after them, to strengthen the cause in which they died. No one can read these memorials without thanking God that these souls have ever lived on earth to bless it and to bear witness to the power of salvation through the Gospel.

The book should be a cherished one in every Christian family.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The Social Economist for January (New York: College of Social Economics, 34 Union Square, East) reviews the incoming of President Cleveland, who "is the very embodiment of the opposition to our industrial policy." Other papers of an opportune character are: The Religious Sentiment in Russia; The Southern Social Problem, by Kemper Boccock; The Individual and the State, by Wm. E. Hart; Economics for the Young, by J. S. Kelsey; The Corner-Stone of Social Strife, by Theodore Cox; A Look About; The Editorial Crucible (timely comment on questions and events of the day), and Book Notices. The present number of this thoughtful periodical begins its fourth volume, and its future, judging from the current issue, is full of promise of fairness and talent in discussing the problems of the age.

American Gardening begins a new volume with the January issue. We know of no contemporary horticultural magazine that can surpass it, either in variety, intelligence, or general interest. About one hundred different topics are ably treated, several of them finely illustrated. Among the latter are the following: Hybrid between Black Currant and Gooseberry; Bronx Park; The Mercer Cherry; Old Cherry Trees; The Gibbs and Orange Crabs; Figs; Fine Gloxianas; John Burroughs at Home; Some Native Mushrooms; Nemesia Strumossa; Parsley in Winter; Winter Pears; Two Interesting Plants: Old-time Roses; Slatted Boxes; Taste and Tact in Arranging Ornamental Grounds; The Penduline Titmouse; The Victoria Regia. Others, not illustrated, are quite as valuable to the horticulturist and gardener. New York: The Rural Publishing Co. (Times Building). $1.00 a year.

The Arena for January discusses the following topics of public interest: Does Bi-chloride of Gold Cure Inebriety? by Henry Wood; Women Wage-earners of America and Europe, by Helen Campbell, with a portrait; A Defence of Shakespeare Against the Baconians, by Prof. W. J. Rolfe; From Human Sacrifice to the Golden Rule, by Rev. J. T. Sunderland; Why the World's Fair Should be Opened on Sunday, by Rev. O. P. Gifford; Are We a Prosperous People? by B. O. Flower; The Nationalization of Railroads, by Rabbi Solomon Schindler; Astrology in London, by Edgar Lee; Growth Comes from Within, by Evalene L. Mason, and a Day in Asia, by Will Allen Dromgoole. The leading editorials relate to interesting physical phenomena, and character-building the next step in educational progress. A pleasant department is Notes and Announcements by the editor. Boston: The Arena Publishing Co.

PAMPHLET.

"SHALL THE SUNDAY CLOSING LAW BE REPEALED?" This is the question asked, carefully reviewed, and strongly answered in the negative, in a sermon delivered by Rev. J. T. Ladd, the pastor of the Epworth Methodist Episcopal church in Chicago, December 4, 1892. Mr. Ladd cites as the foundation of this excellent discourse, Exodus 20: 8-11, the original command to keep the Sabbath holy—a command that required strict obedience and merited death for its willful infraction. The preacher, as becomes a faithful counsellor, does not inform his hearers that God himself has ever repealed that law, and certainly does not believe that man is authorized to change its sacred duties into Sunday sight-seeing, careless observance, or secular amusement; nor does he believe that man has a right to ignore its divine origin and requirements. The arguments for opening the Exposition on Sunday are promptly and logically met with many sound reasons why its gates should be closed on that day. Readers can obtain copies of this pamphlet by addressing Hon. J. C. Scovel, 125 Clark street, Chicago.

OBITUARY.

MRS. SIMON BESECKER.

(Melissa Miller) was born in Scott township, Lackawanna Co., Pa., October 17, 1817. Her parents, Stephen and Mary Miller, were among the first settlers in Scott, clearing a place in the forest and building for themselves a home in 1812, where, through honest toil and frugality, peace and plenty spread out before them; and where only the thick forest had been, soon broad fields of grain and fruits waved in the sunlight. Ten children were given them, the subject of this sketch being the fourth. When near twenty years of age she went to live with an uncle, Rufus Miller, in Lackawanna township, and spent eight years in the family.

When about twenty-three years of age she sought and found the pardon of her sins. Although brought up under religious influences, a few words personally addressed to her by Bro. Noah Patrick, then a young minister, fastened themselves in her heart like an arrow, and she saw herself lost and ruined, and after three days of earnest prayer she was enabled to accept Christ as her Saviour, and was brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God. The change in her was real and radical. She not only knew herself that she had passed from death unto life, but those who knew her could say she had been with Jesus and learned of him, for she who had lived without hope and without God now became a most exemplary and true disciple of Jesus.

She united with the M. E. church. Some time after this she sought and obtained the blessing of holiness and lived a most devoted Christian life.

February 7, 1849, she was united in marriage to Simon Besecker, a pious young man and member in the same church with her. Three children were given them, and for forty-three years of their married life the family chain remained unbroken by death, this loving wife and mother being the first taken.

Her life was one of activity, both religiously and in the duties of her home. She was industrious, frugal and self-denying. She was kind and affectionate. She was always deeply interested in the salvation of those around her and especially her children, praying daily for their salvation and that their lives might be a blessing to the world.

It had been her custom for many years to spend a time in the afternoon of each day in reading the Bible she loved so much, and in prayer, and often from the secret recesses of her closet rang out joyful exclamations of praise. When her children were small she took them with her in her closet, at times, and prayed personally for them, and every night around the family altar she never forgot to plead for a blessing upon them. After kneeling by her bedside at night, committing herself to God's care, and retiring, she then prayed from her heart that sweet little prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

She always adhered to the principles of the early Methodists as to a clear witness of the spirit, and separation from the world in spirit and practice. She did not try to make herself peculiar, but was willing to become such for Christ's sake. She united with the Free Methodist church in 1872 and held her membership with them until her death.

For many years their home was known as "Pilgrims' Home," and many a minister and Christian worker learned what that meant. God gives to every one his work. Their work was to entertain pilgrims. Many a traveler, footsore, worn and weary, hungry and thirsty, was gladly received and ministered unto, and the extra toil and expense was cheerfully given for the Master's sake.

She had been a sufferer physically for a number of years, but during the time she had many answers to prayer for her body. For more than six months previous to her death she had enjoyed very good health, when she accidentally fell by stepping backward on her dress, causing a compound fracture of the right hip joint and dislocation. Everything that skill, money and love could do was done for her; but her work on earth was done, and after five weeks of suffering death came as a relief June 8, 1892, making her age seventy-four years, seven months and twelve days. During these days and nights of pain and suffering she never murmured once. Asking her if she could still praise God in this terrible affliction and suffering she replied, "Oh, yes, I can praise God in this; it is all right." Then in the beautiful words of patient Job she said, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God and shall we not receive evil?"

Once she seemed struggling with deep emotions after it had become evident that the tender ties of the flesh must be broken. A loving daughter bending over her asked what was the matter? With heaving breast and tear-bedimmed eye she replied, "I suppose you will all be in despair." Then after a pause, and with a desperate effort to speak she said, "I feel so sorry for father," as she familiarly called her husband to the children. She knew so well how he loved and depended on her, and foresaw the pangs of sorrow and loneliness he must feel.

About ten days before her death she received a wonderful baptism of the Holy Spirit. Her nurse, who was the only one present with her at the time, said it surpassed anything she had ever witnessed. Her face shone like the face of an angel, and the ecstasy of joy she experienced seemed almost more than the mortal could endure. She shouted the praises of God and said she was ready at any moment to depart and be with Christ. She rejoiced that she had lived to see two of her children and some of her grandchildren consecrated to the service of God, and the only pang she felt was that one of her children was yet unsaved; but, she said, "I have prayed for him and I believe my prayers will be answered."

Shortly after this her mind so wandered that she was able to converse rationally but very little, and when her work and suffering was finished, just before midnight, the Bridegroom came and she went in with him to the marriage supper of the Lamb. Language fails to express to the stranger what she was as a wife, mother, Christian and neighbor; but to those who knew her, her life and example stands as witness of the power of God to save and keep.

Her funeral services were conducted by Rev. W. B. Rose, assisted by Rev. J. E. Perry and Rev. O. P. Parsons. The text was, "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life. 2 Cor. 5:4. We laid her in the family cemetery in the spot she had selected, where, when the trump of God shall sound, that dear form will be resurrected and glorified to be forever with the Lord.

Gone, gone, mother—gone from our circle;
The home seems so lonely and bare;
How we miss the warm kiss and caresses;
The kind, gentle warning and prayer.

But while our hearts bleed and seem broken,
And all seems so gloomy and sad,
The voice of our Saviour hath spoken,
"Rejoice! be exceedingly glad."

What! rejoice! Yes. All things work together

For good, to whoever loves God.
The spirit now dwells in a mansion,
Though the form may be laid 'neath the sod.

For our mother loved Jesus the Saviour;
Her heart in his blood was made white;
And blessed their death he hath told us—
Yea, blessed their death in his sight.

Dear mother, we hope soon to meet you;
We'll follow the path you have trod.
Then in heaven we know we will greet you,
And rest in the palace of God.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

A strong, healthy woman instead of a tired and ailing one! Sounds like a miracle, doesn't it? But it isn't. It's only the ordinary, every-day work of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription—just the work that it was made for.

It's a woman's medicine, carefully compounded for her by an experienced physician, and adapted to her delicate organization. It makes weak women strong, suffering women well. It's an invigorating, restorative tonic, a soothing and bracing nerve, and a certain cure for all the functional derangements, painful disorders or chronic weaknesses peculiar to the sex. For ulceration, displacements, bearing-down sensations, "female complaints" of every kind, it's a never-failing remedy.

And, among all the medicines that claim to help women, "Favorite Prescription" is the only one that's guaranteed to do what is promised for it. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in any case, you have your money back.

Is something else, that may pay the dealer better, likely to be "just as good" for you?

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1893.

All men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father which hath sent him.—JOHN 5:23.

THE N. C. A.'S ADVANCE STEP.

The United Presbyterian Christian Instructor of Philadelphia, in its issue of the 12th instant, thus refers to our Association and its prospective new work:

"The National Christian Association, which operates from Chicago against the secret orders, is arranging for a conference on this question on a new plan. Presbyteries, associations and other church bodies have been asked to appoint representatives to a conference in which there may be a free interchange of views and experiences, and of which it is hoped there may spring some method of reaching the churches more effectually. A considerable number have responded, and others are expected to do so at the spring meetings."

Papers throughout the country are requested to give publicity to this movement, the importance of which cannot be too strongly urged. The evils of secret societies in the church, the state and the home are now receiving a widespread ventilation, and not an hour too soon. Witness the following:

A church at Niles, Kansas, which was built by the Liberal branch of the United Brethren church and Odd-fellows in partnership, has just been dedicated, and the fact is thus noticed by the Christian Conservator (Radical U. B.) of Dayton, Ohio:

"The Odd-fellows and the Liberals have gone in partnership and have built a joint church. One of these—the Odd-fellows—strike Jesus' name from all their prayers and oblige their chaplain to 'use none other than the prescribed forms,' which shuts off Christ completely, debars them from access to God, makes it false worship, which is devil-worship. So that the Liberals have gone into partnership with demon-worship, and the two have built a church to worship together. This is horrible in the sight of God and good men."

It is to convince men and women in the Christian churches of these horrible evils that the N. C. A., with the Cynosure, is earnestly laboring and praying.

THE KEELEY CURE AS A REFORMER.

Among the most conspicuous articles printed in the Arena for January, is that of Henry Wood, who discusses the problem, "Does Bi-chloride of Gold Cure Inebriety?" Premising that the public is confronted with two popular assertions, both supported by portions of the secular press, as follows: "Thousands of confirmed inebriates have been thoroughly cured by the Keeley treatment;" and, "No drug or material remedy can cure drunkenness, as proved both by expert testimony and the experience of ages"—Mr. Wood says: "It is axiomatic that two truths cannot be in conflict, and how shall these two great aggregations of opposing logic be reconciled? There seems to be but one way, and, rightly considered, it is reasonable and also scientific. It is that the so-called bi-chloride of gold cure is in reality unconscious mind-cure."

The discussion of this subject from Mr. Wood's standpoint suggests several thoughts that may be worth a few moments' consideration.

1. If the drunkard is a sinner, condemned in the sight of God, and unable to enter the kingdom of heaven, as stated in the Bible (1 Cor. 6: 10), his soul's salvation must depend upon his thorough repentance and reform. The former opens his way to Christ for salvation; but while a drunkard, in his inebriety, or in the act of recovering from a debauch, may be filled with an intense degree of remorse (as many are), he may not easily be brought to realize the existence of a divine Deliverer. Should he feel the need of an all-sufficient Saviour, then or at any time, he will realize that he must cease to drink to excess, or make an earnest effort to do so, before he can properly approach the throne of grace for forgiveness.

2. At such a time the bi-chloride of gold, or some other potent remedy, may serve as a welcome agent to sufficiently sober him to allow grace to perform its perfect work. For, like other sinners, he must be born again if he would become a citizen of the new Jerusalem.

3. It therefore follows that if the Keeley cure for inebriety takes from the drunkard the appetite for ardent spirits, it cannot fit him for the kingdom of heaven any more than it would any other man who was never intoxicated, yet was never converted. It may bring intoxication of the body to an end, and by so doing strengthen the will and the aspirations of a new manhood, but it is not enough. The religion of Jesus Christ, and that only, can perform the greater salvation of the soul.

4. Something more, however, is necessary than a bi-chloride of gold remedy to bring the prodigal drunkard to himself and to his Father's house, and that a human will, assisted by the Holy Spirit, to arrest the common methods of making drunkards, so as to render Keeley and all other cures for dipsomania totally unnecessary in society.

5. Mr. Wood calls the Keeley process an "unconscious mind-cure;" intimating that bi-chloride of gold is of little potency in destroying the appetite for ardent spirits. Medical men have assumed the same position; but it matters little. If it is efficient in arresting a vice upon which rests the curse of God, let the advocates of the Gospel be none the less diligent in their labors against the saloon and in behalf of the saving power of Jesus Christ.

AN ANNIVERSARY.

The winter of 1842-'43—just fifty years ago—was remarkable throughout the northern part of the United States.

First, because of the intensity of what was known as "the Millerite excitement," growing out of the prophecy of William Miller that the Second Advent of Christ would occur in 1843; and this excitement was further intensified by the additional forecast of Miller or his adherents that the coming Saviour would appear in April of 1843. In Illinois, Wisconsin and other Western States there were great demonstrations of fear on the part of some, and of marked enthusiasm on that of others. The manifestations of these two mental conditions were frequent suicides, the giving away of farms and other property as of no value, and numerous meetings led by Miller's disciples.

Secondly, about the beginning of March, the southwestern heavens were spanned by a strange comet, with its head at the western horizon, and its tail extending to the zenith. It was a puzzle to the best astronomers living throughout the world. In Wisconsin the weather during that month was unusually cold, and where the writer was then residing there was not a day when ice out of doors would melt, even when exposed to the sun. The comet and the peculiar meteorological conditions served to create additional fear and excitement among the people as certain signs of the approaching "end of the world"—a catastrophe which the popular mind confounded with the coming of our Lord.

Thirdly, somewhere in the Mississippi river, north of St. Louis, another phenomenon occurred, about the same time, that added to the general excitement. In some manner, by the yielding of the bed of the river, a whirlpool of considerable dimensions was formed, for which no one could positively account; and this new wonder added to the prevailing disorder.

The results of this religious enthusiasm did not cease with the non-fulfillment of Miller's prophecy. The Millerites had become extremely numerous, and, although disappointed, they continued to insist, from time to time, that the Lord would come at an early day, and unadvisedly they set new dates for his advent. Thus the excitement was kept up for several years with more or less fervor, until new chronological calculations served to dispel the illusions which Miller had promulgated with such mischievous effects.

One of the dates for the general catastrophe was April 23, 1843. It was a beautiful spring morning, and soon after sunrise the writer and his family were startled by the discovery that the log-cabin in which they lived was on fire. Active exertions, however, soon extinguished the flames; but for a little while the general trend of public agitation tended to augment the emotions caused by the lesser event.

Miller lived long enough to learn that he had made an error in his calculations, and went peacefully to his rest, to await the Lord's time rather than that indicated by his own futile predictions.

DR. E. P. GOODWIN'S JUBILEE.

The celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. Dr. Edward P. Goodwin over the First Congregational church of Chicago, on the 8th instant, and the generous reception given to him and his estimable wife last Thursday evening, have been widely published in the secular press; and there seems to be but one general sentiment,—that he has been an extremely faithful and successful servant of the Gospel.

In his memorial sermon, on Sunday morning, he reviewed the earlier history of the church and congregation, relating much of interest concerning those who had been prominent in its organization and support.

The following reminiscences in connection with the origin of the First Church bring prominently into light one of the most honored of the friends and patrons of the National Christian Association.

In 1850 many Christians inside the Presbyterian church were deeply agitated on the question of slavery, and it was expected that the General Assembly, at its meeting in Detroit in that year, would make some specific deliverance on the subject. The General Assembly, however, succeeded in evading the question by a compromise resolution that was intended to shelve the subject indefinitely. The members of the Third Presbyterian church of Chicago took a keen interest in the anti-slavery agitation that was then going on, and a majority of them being indignant at the action of the General Assembly, forty-two out of sixty-eight members voted in favor of standing aloof from all meetings of presbytery, synod or assembly, until the policy of the assembly was clearly defined. This was a violation of the standards of the church, and Dr. R. W. Patterson, who was then moderator of presbytery, asked the majority to rescind their resolution. On this being refused, the anti-slavery members were summarily declared to be cut off from the church.

Mr. Philo Carpenter, the leader of the expelled members, had erected a wooden structure, at his own expense, as an annex to the church, which was then an unpretentious wooden building on Union street, near Randolph. Mr. Carpenter claimed this as his own property, and the two opposing congregations—twenty-six in the church and forty-two in the annex—met side by side at the same hour each Sunday, with only a wooden partition between them, and went through their devotions. A church was organized, under the leadership of Deacon Carpenter, the site of the new building being on the southwest corner of Washington and Jefferson streets, and the Rev. J. M. Williams became the first pastor, in 1852. That was the beginning of a church that has been the mother of churches in Chicago. At least a dozen churches on the West Side that have now independent societies had their origin as mission stations of the First Congregational church.

Those who best know Dr. Goodwin revere him heartily, and earnestly hope that he may be spared for many years to minister to his congregation and combat the world, the flesh and the devil, both inside and outside of the secret lodges which infest the whole land.

THE RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE.

An article in the December number of the Arena, on "Religious Intolerance in Tennessee," is deserving of consideration by all who would respect the rights of conscience. Three men, who are reputed to be conscientious Christian farmers, who were Seventh-day Adventists, were convicted of working on their farms on the first day of the week, and were sentenced to over forty days in jail, a fine, and finally were sent to work with the chain-gang. It appeared in evidence that they had religiously kept the seventh day, and that they interrupted or disturbed no one who kept the first day.

However mistaken these men may have been, and however we may deplore their unwillingness to conform to the general convictions of society, the idea that they were to be singled out for legal vengeance, while the monstrous disregard of all Sabbath laws—both human and divine—by the great railroad corporations, the Sunday newspapers and the saloons, is winked at, is a perversion of justice of which every good citizen ought to be ashamed.

The Arena says: "It is a crying shame that such insane fanaticism, such anti-Christian intolerance should flourish at this late day; and doubly shameful that our sense of justice and love of liberty are so benumbed that we do not rise up against such liberty-destroying inhumanity."

But we are asked, does not the law of God say "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers?" and does it not follow that even unjust and oppressive enactments are to be obeyed? True; but there are two ways in which we may be subject to what we may deem unjust and oppressive legislation. One is by obeying it under protest; and the other by quietly enduring the penalty of disobedience. It was the latter way that these men adopted. It is the same course that Christian men pursued toward the fugitive-slave law, and that Bro. Wm. F. Davis adopted in respect to the police regulation in Boston, that no one should preach, without permission, on Boston Common. He was sentenced to jail for one year, and his passive endurance broke down the law. It would have doubtless been the wiser course if these men (unless driven to stern necessity) had abstained from labor on the first day of the week, out of respect for the convictions of others. But the question is not whether they rightly understood the law of God or took the wisest way to observe it. The duty of the state was plain. It ought to have respected the rights of conscience, even of a perverted conscience, so long as it did not lead to any interference with the rights of others.

When the monstrous liquor traffic, which is strictly forbidden on the first day of the week, but which does more to destroy men on that than on any other day of the seven, shall receive adequate attention, it will be time to look after the Christian farmers.

REVIVAL OF THE "MOLLY MAGUIRES".

Early this month reports came from Pennsylvania that if the proprietors of coal mines, as proposed, designed to reduce the wages of the laborers employed by them, "an army of between 80,000 and 100,000 resolute colliers are enrolled under the flag of the miners' union and prepared to inaugurate a hostile demonstration against any unreasonable rules and regulations that the coal monopolists may place in operation to regulate the production of anthracite fuel at the mining centers."

In this connection, it is also stated that a revival of the barbarous society known as the Molly Maguires threatens to add horror to the catastrophe. Some years ago, when Molly Maguireism was rife; when murder, breaker burning, and general lawlessness were the order of the day, the Coal and Iron Miners' union drove the members of that blood-dyed and infamous organization, the Molly Maguires, to the town coal fields, and, finally, the banded law-breakers were hounded to the scaffold, many men imprisoned for life, while others became fugitives from justice.

With the disbandment of the Molly Maguire brotherhood and the dethronement of the members from power, it was believed that Molly Maguireism was forever silenced and the "body-masters" driven out of the coal-producing country. Recent events, however, have shown that the terrible association of murderers, conspirators, incendiaries and all-around desperadoes, is, numerically, as strong as ever.

The Molly Maguires, or, as they are styled, "moonlighters," hold regular secret meetings in secluded retreats, and, it is stated by detectives who have recently watched their movements, that their membership reaches several thousand bold and daring men. Among them have been recognized well-known leaders of the old organization whose very name inspired terror among the people inhabiting the Schuylkill, Lehigh, Wyoming, and Lackawanna valleys.

Since the discovery of the presence of these sworn law-breakers numerous murders and other atrocious crimes have been perpetrated. Three Hungarian, four Polish, and two Italian miners have been mysteriously assassinated, while incendiarism is of almost daily occurrence. All this criminality is attributed to the influence of the Molly Maguire element, and there are those who stoutly claim Molly Maguireism does actually exist in the Lehigh region, as no less than six cruel murders of foreign-born mine workers have occurred near Hazelton, Jeansville, Jeddo, Audenried, and other coal towns in what is the Lehigh region proper.

THE ANTI-CHRIST.

In the excellent and timely article by Rev. Alex. Thomson, in the Cynosure of December 15, ult., he speaks of the state of religious opinion in Northern Wisconsin (and this is largely true of the entire Northwest), and seems to conclude that these anti-Christian influences will somehow consolidate under a personal leadership, which will be the very anti-Christ.

Doubtless there is to arise in the earth a great power in opposition to Christianity, and this will be the personal and prophetic anti-Christ, whom our Lord "will consume with the spirit of his mouth, and destroy with the brightness of his coming." Doubtless, too, there are now many anti-Christ, which, however divided, all agree in withholding all divine honor from the Lord Jesus Christ.

But it seems to us that the tendency is not at present so much to consolidation as to division and strife. Sin, in all its forms, tends to disintegration, separation and inharmony.

Only holiness unites. False religions, including Freemasonry and kindred secret societies, are one of its forms. Mammon-worship, international war, and the spirit of schism and rivalry among professed Christians, are all anti-Christ. Satan, who is their promoter, and under whose inspiring influence they have their being, seeks not to unite these opposing forces, but rather to direct attention by war.

This is strikingly illustrated by the pseudo-strife between Romanism and Freemasonry. It serves to divert public attention from the true nature of both these false religions, and to lead the unthinking to suppose that they do well to help any institution that opposes a greater evil. This is one of the stock arguments among Protestants for not opposing Freemasonry; but they do not consider that the triumph of either would mean the overthrow of all true religion.

—Every subscriber and reader of the Cynosure is invited to act as an individual agent for our anti-secrecy literature, canvassing for the paper and all books published in our printed lists. Liberal terms allowed.

—From F. B. Mills, of the Fairview Seed Farm, Rose Hill, New York, we have received his 1893 catalogue of choice garden and flower seeds, containing a mass of valuable information for those who have room, time and inclination for gardening. For copies of it, send to the foregoing address.

—New Year's day was celebrated in Rev. Roland D. Grant's Baptist church, at Portland, Ore., with a special address by the pastor, a fine musical service, and a church reception. Mr. Grant is a warm friend of our anti-secrecy reform, and his testimony against the lodges is this: "Their oaths are extra-judicial, and are, therefore, not binding on any man. We have all law for this."

—Rev. S. F. Porter, the College agent, writes from Nottoway Court House, Va., on the 9th instant: "I have just returned from Jetersville, where I preached yesterday. I spent last week at Chase City. I assisted in a temperance meeting at Thyne Institute (of which Rev. J. H. Veasey is president), where I had spent Friday. I had preached there on Sunday evening, January 1st. The weather is down to zero."

—The country lost, last week, by the death of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, one of its most erudite exponents of international law, an efficient soldier, a thorough patriot, and a politician of extreme shrewdness. That he never became a leading statesman was due to his predilections for political finesse. In other words, he preferred being a demagogue. Otherwise he might have easily attained a more noble character and a higher official position than he ever enjoyed.

—The publishers of the United Presbyterian, at Pittsburgh, Pa., which has just entered upon its fifty-first year of publication with an apparently good degree of prosperity, send us their little Handbook for 1893. Besides analyses of the Sunday-school lessons for the year, it contains denominational statistics and other interesting church intelligence.

—Rev. M. A. Gault preached on Sabbath, the 8th inst., in the U. P. church near Sussex, Wis. He addressed a meeting at Coulterville, Ill., on the evening of the 12th. His appointments in Southern Illinois are as follows: Tilden, Jan. 13; Marissa, 15; Pleasant Hill, 16; Jordan's Grove, 17; Baldwin, 18; Old Bethel, 19; Sparta, 20; Oakdale, 21 and 22; Sandwich, 23.

—Our stalwart contemporary, the Wesleyan Methodist, published at Syracuse, N. Y., has entered on the new year with new form, new type, and a new heading, having sixteen quarto pages and showing a considerable enlargement. For more than half a century this excellent religious journal has been the faithful representative of all Christian reforms. We know of no other that has been so long, and so uncompromising, in its opposition to all iniquity. We trust that many friends will rally to the support of our brethren in their new undertaking.

—Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, has received a warning from S. Heidenfeldt, Jr., a gentleman who has made electro-magnetism and kindred arts a careful study, to this effect: "I have been informed that there are seventeen secret societies which electro-magnetize their members, who are, without knowing it, connected with a system in India, Arabia and Germany." In an article printed in the Cynosure for August 25, 1892, by Joseph Hopson of the British army in India, entitled "Demonism in Freemasonry," the same idea is elucidated at length. It is one not popularly received, but the evidence of its truth is quite as strong as that in opposition to it. Mr. Heidenfeldt's views are underlined for an early insertion in these columns. Rev. William Fenton is a strong believer in the demonism of Freemasonry.

—Jacob Shanibarger, of Mansfield, Ohio, proposes to open a public reading room, supplied liberally with books and papers relating to all the great Christian reforms. "Regarding the subject of secrecy," he writes, "perhaps my debt will never be paid, in that my attention was first arrested, and my first knowledge on this subject received, some years ago, in connection with a free reading room at 221 West Madison street, Chicago, under the auspices of the National Christian Association. Up to my 28th year not the least knowledge of this question had reached me." Mr. Shanibarger is at present dealing heavy blows at the evils of secret lodges. He adds: "I was told, on what I believe to be good authority, that in the North Ohio M. E. Conference there remains but one presiding elder who does not belong to the lodge;" and this one is likely to be swept into the maelstrom that has engulfed the others.

—The bleak and stormy days of January have brought disaster, discomfort and suffering to many lands on this and the European continent. But the poor have felt their influence far more than have those who are blessed with competence or wealth; yet in the providence of God every tear, every pang, every prayer of distress has been sent in love for the fulfillment of his divine design. Happy is the man or woman who has not murmured when the cold blasts have swept over them; who can say with Elihu: "Great things doeth God, which we cannot comprehend; for he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; likewise to the small rain, and to the great rain of his strength . . . Out of the south cometh the whirlwind; and cold out of the north. By the breath of God frost is given, and the breath of the waters is straitened." (Job 37: 5, 6, 9, 10.) It is a time for opening our hearts to the poor, to remember the suffering and to do whatsoever our hand findeth to do in the work of sympathy and relief. Let us bow our heads in humility, return thanks for the blessings we enjoy, and remember that it is the Lord's doing; let him do what he will.

THE HOME.

A HUSBAND'S TRIALS.

I've been doing woman's work for at least a week or more,
And I'll own it isn't anything like fun;
For when you try to think that your labor's nearly o'er,
You will often find you've only just begun.
There is boiling, and there's baking,
There is sweeping, and bed-making,
And a thousand other things not understood
By a novice such as I,
And so I won't deny
That I would not be a woman if I could.

This is how it came about: My wife was taken sick;
No help was to be had, so like a dunce,
I thought I'd try my hand, but I found out very quick
That I couldn't think of everything at once.
The fire was slowly dying
When I put the steak a-frying,
And the cat was making havoc with the bread
I had prepared for toasting,
While the apple that was roasting
Was a plaything for the pug upon the bed.

When I went to wash the dishes I found the kettle dry;
The spout was melted off, and on the floor
It lay, a perfect wreck, that awoke a pensive sigh
As I thought upon the happy days of yore.
I reflected on the bliss
Of domestic scenes like this,
And I couldn't hit on any other plan.
It might be called bewitching,
But the work done in a kitchen,
Is not within the scope of any common man.

So I'd like to mention this to every friend and neighbor,
That woman's work is never overdrawn;
My respect is something greater for the housewife's daily labor
Since the trials I have lately undergone,
Their woes are not misstated,
For I've been initiated,
And I'm bound to help them every time I can.
There's a recompense in doing
What alone is worth pursuing,
And woman's loving labor is a blessing unto man.

A CHINESE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The following letter was originally intended for the Sunday-school at Janesville, Wis., from which place the writer went to her field in China:

I want to tell you a little about a Sunday-school away out here in China. It meets every Sunday morning at 9 o'clock in Tieng Aug Dong, or Church of the Heavenly Rest, which is only a few steps from where I live. The church itself is very plain, with bare wooden benches for seats, and no carpet or matting on the floor. The men and boys sit on one side, and the women and girls on the other. They tell me that until a very few years ago there was a partition reaching half way to the ceiling between the two sides, but this has been taken down. The opening exercises are very much like those in your Sunday-school, only in Chinese, of course. The attendance averages over 200, and the order of the school is very good. The smallest boys on the very front seat keep just as still as mice all through the opening service, and last Sunday a whole seat full of them stayed to church, and were just as good there. There is a very good organ in the church, and how the boys and girls do love to sing! They sing a good many of the same songs that you do, these having been translated into Chinese for them. They study the same lessons, too. They have Sunday-school quarterlies, with the lessons and golden texts and explanatory notes. What would be the back of your lesson leaf is the front of theirs, and they read from right to left through the book. Each page is read from top to bottom.

Nearly all the pupils in our school wear a dress made of a kind of blue cloth, so they present a very bright picture when all together. The boys have the hair shaved from half their head, and the rest is combed back and braided into the "queue." They braid black silk cord in with the hair to make the queue heavier and longer. The girls and women dress their hair very elaborately. They comb it very smooth and straight, and then do it up in loops and coils in the backs, and stick in all the fancy ornaments and flowers they can afford. No matter if her dress is patched in a dozen different places, a Chinese woman will always contrive to have a bright paper flower in her hair. A poor woman came to Sunday-school last Sunday with her baby boy, a year-and-a-half or two years old. She had on an old patched dress, her bare feet thrust into some ragged Chinese shoes, but her hair was as smooth as satin, and in one side near the ear was a very gay pink flower, with its green leaves all made of paper. The women wear no hats at this time of year, so their hair shows off to good advantage.

After the opening exercises the classes gather close around their teacher; and I know you will be surprised when I tell you that the superintendent gave me a class the very first Sunday I was here in that Chinese Sunday-school. A class of Chinese? Oh, indeed, no! It is a class of missionary children who have no English Sunday-school to attend; and a very nice class it is. When they have finished the lesson the superintendent talks to them a little while, then the school report is given, and the school is over. It is the only pleasant thing some of these poor little boys and girls have, and it does me good to see how much they enjoy it.—Miss Sarah M. Bosworth, Foochow, China.

A LIVELY SCENE IN CHURCH.

Hezekiah Butterworth, in the Boston Journal, tells this amusing story of what once happened in church in the days when the reputations of those who came late to the public service suffered:

One Sunday morning in early autumn one of the women, whose reputation for housekeeping, spinning and church attendance was excellent, was belated in her morning work. She took her long-necked pitcher and went to the pasture where her cow was waiting to be milked. This duty done, she found—for she could see people on the road—that she hadn't time to even carry her milk back to the house and get to church in season. So she took her long-necked pitcher along with her and sat in the gallery right near where the singers and bass viols were displayed. After the singing was over, and the long sermon had begun—sermons were an hour or two long in those days—she grew sleepy. Her long-necked pitcher sat on the floor near by and near the front of the gallery. She was soon oblivious of either milk, sermon or the dog that came pit-patting up the gallery stairs.

Of course the milk soon attracted him. He smelt and wagged his tail, then smelt and wagged again, then looked inquiringly at the unconscious milkmaid. He made up his mind very soon, and into the long neck went the dog's head and neck too. He couldn't get much milk, and wanted to pull back and try again; but he couldn't. His head was wedged fast in. He pulled and used his paws and tried to back away. Blinded, of course, by the pitcher, his steps were erratic, and suddenly, to the astonished people below, there appeared a sudden parting of the balcony curtain, an almost blood-curdling yell was heard, and there was a flash and downpouring, straight in among the four unconscious occupants of the deacon's pew beneath, of snow-white milk, long-necked pitcher, and a milk-soaked, frightened dog. For once there was a great awakening in that church!

KING ALFRED AND THE ORPHAN.

King Alfred was sitting one day in his palace, dispensing justice, and surrounded by his barons or thanes—as the nobles of the country were called in those days—when, as his eye glanced over the assembled group, he observed that the place of one faithful servant was vacant, and, in answer to his inquiries as to the cause of the absence of the Earl of Holderness, he was informed that the noble thane and his lady had both died a short time previous. Before the monarch could express his grief, his informant, the warrior Wulph, proceeded to asked Alfred to confer on him the estates of Holderness (that part of Yorkshire lying between the mouth of the Humber and the German Ocean) as a reward for his prowess in war. Instantly another noble, the wise Thurston, spoke:

"Nay, king, it would be more just to bestow them on me, for dost thou not remember how, when at thy command I crossed the sea, my wisdom was of more avail at the Danish court than all the warlike skill and bravery of Wulph?"

At that moment a door at the far end of the room opened, and a pale, toil-worn woman entered, leading by the hand a lovely boy, whose flaxen hair, blue eyes, and fair complexion, plainly showed his Saxon origin. With difficulty she pressed through the throng of anxious and excited nobles, until she stood before the monarch himself; then bending low, she said:

"O gracious king, I ask that justice may be done to this boy, the only child of the Earl of Holderness and the lady Alice. He has no father now to defend him, no mother to care for him, but orphaned and utterly friendless he looks to thee for protection. His is the orphan's claim—O king, regard it!"

Here she was interrupted by one of the thanes who angrily exclaimed:

"His claim, forsooth! What, dost thou think then that our king needs the services of babes such as that? No; in these troubled times, when our Danish foes are threatening us on all sides, we want men with active bodies, stout arms, and brave hearts. If the lands of Holderness be given to that child, even though he were the lawful heir, say, what could he do to guard his country?"

The little fellow lifted his bright blue eyes to the stern speaker, and replied, "I would pray to God in heaven."

The good king Alfred—than whom a nobler or better king never sat on England's throne—looked earnestly, first at the upturned face of the boy, then upon his thanes, who were anxiously awaiting the royal decision, and, rising, said slowly and solemnly:

"The king will gladly give all praise and due reward to the faithful thanes who served him so well in times of need, but the estates of Holderness must be restored to this child, for they are his by birthright and his claim; the orphan's claim is before all other—his father is God who reigns in heaven."—British Workman.

THE SOLDIER'S TESTIMONY.

Among the touching incidents of the Crimean war comes the following: The battle was over. All day long it had raged; but now the conflict had ceased, for the victory was won. Upon the solemn battlefield, among the wounded, the dying and the dead, lay one who had fought bravely and well through the battle's wild alarm. The dimness of death was upon his eyes; its icy hand was stopping the slow beating of his heart, and checking the current of his blood. He was dying, and he knew it; and now in the quiet evening he lay silent, waiting for the end. Searching for the living among the dead, two of his comrades found him there, and with gentle hands lifted him to carry him to the camp. All tender as they were, the movement was more than he could bear; and, stifling the moan upon his lips, he bade them lay him down and let him die in peace. They laid him down and stood beside him with uncertain will. It seemed so cruel to leave him there, unattended and alone, to die; and yet to carry him farther was but to hasten his death. And so they left him, and hurried on their work of mercy. An officer, soon after passing by, saw him and stopped.

"Shall I get you a drink of water, my poor fellow?" he asked gently.

"No, thank you, sir."

"Is there anything I can do for you?"

"No, thank you, sir."

"Have you any relative or friend to whom you would like to send a message? I will gladly take it."

"I have not a friend in the world."

The officer was silent. He had stood by many a dying man, but never yet one who had not some loved name upon his lips. Kneeling down, he wiped the death-damp from the bronzed forehead with pitying hand.

"Is there nothing at all I can do for you, my poor fellow? Do you wish for nothing?"

Slowly the dying man opened his eyes and looked into the kindly, sympathizing young face. "There is one thing, sir, I should like," he murmured. "In my knapsack—my Bible."

Opening the knapsack, the officer took out a little well-worn Bible.

"Is there any particular part you wish to hear?" he asked.

"The fourteenth chapter of St. John—near the end—you will find—something about peace."

He turned over the leaves and found the place. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." Fitting words for that solemn battlefield! The dim eyes opened, and a look of radiant happiness fell upon the soldier's face. The cold lips moved with broken, murmured words, and the officer bowed his head to listen.

"That peace—is mine! heaven is—mine! that Saviour—is mine!"

The night closed round, drawing its pall of darkness over the dying and the dead. Motionless and still, with upturned face and folded hands, lay the dead body of the friendless man, with his little worn old Bible lying on his breast. And they laid him in a nameless grave, in a strange and far-off land.—Selected.

HOW BEECHER READ UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.

I was talking with Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher a few evenings ago and the conversation happened to turn on "Uncle Tom's Cabin." I asked her if Mr. Beecher had ever expressed an opinion of his sister's famous book, and she told me this interesting story of how the famous preacher read the story:

"When the story was first published in the National Era in chapters all our family, excepting Mr. Beecher, looked impatiently for its appearance each week. But try as we might we could not persuade Mr. Beecher to read it, or let us tell him anything about it.

"It is folly for you to be kept in constant excitement week after week," he would say. "I shall wait till the work is completed, and take it all at one dose."

"When the work was finished the book came to Mr. Beecher on the morning of a day when he had a meeting on hand for the afternoon and a speech to make in the evening. The book was quietly laid one side, for he always scrupulously avoided everything that could interfere with or retard work he was expected to do. But the next day was a free day. Mr. Beecher rose even earlier than usual, and as soon as dressed began to read 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' When breakfast was ready he took his book with him to the table, and reading and eating went on together, but speaking never a word. After morning prayers he threw himself on the sofa, forgot everything but his book, and read uninterruptedly till dinner time.

"Though evidently beginning to be intensely interested, for a long time he controlled any marked indication of it; but before noon I knew the storm was gathering that would conquer his self-control, as it had done with us all. He frequently 'gave way to his pocket handkerchief,' to use one of his old remarks, in a most vigorous manner. I could not refrain, in return for his teasing me for reading the work weekly, from saying demurely as I passed him once, 'You seem to have a severe cold. How could you have taken it?' But what did I gain? Not even a half-annoyed shake of the head or the semblance of a smile. I might as well have spoken to the Sphinx.

"When reminded that the dinner-bell had rung he rose and went to the table, still with his book in his hand. He asked the blessing with a tremor in his voice, which showed the intense excitement under which he was laboring. We were alone at the table, and there was nothing to distract his thoughts. He drank his coffee, ate but little, and returned to his reading, with no thought of indulging in his usual afternoon nap. Evidences of almost uncontrollable excitement in the form of half-suppressed sobs were frequent.

"Mr. Beecher was never a rapid reader. I was getting uneasy over the marks of great feeling and excitement, and longed to have him finish the book. I could see that he entered into the whole story, every scene, as if it was being acted right before him, and he himself was the sufferer. He had always been a pronounced Abolitionist, and the story he was reading roused all he had felt on that subject intensely.

"The night came on. It was growing late, and I felt impelled to urge him to retire. Without raising his eyes from the book, he replied:

"Soon, soon; you go; I'll come soon."

"Closing the house, I went to our room, but not to sleep. The clock struck 12, 1, 2, 3; and then, to my great relief, I heard Mr. Beecher coming upstairs. As he entered he threw 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' on the table, exclaiming: 'There! I've done it. But if Hattie Stowe ever writes anything more like that, I'll—well! She has nearly killed me, anyhow!"

"And he never picked up the book from that day."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

THE SPARROW IN THE SNOW.

He hopped down cheerily into the snow,
Brave little barefoot Brownie—
As if snow were the warmest thing below,
And as cosy as it is downy!

And his brown little knowing, saucy head,
In a way that was 'cutely funny,
He jerked to one side, as though he said,
"I don't care if it isn't sunny."

"I don't care! I don't care! I don't care!" he said,
And he winked with his eyes so cheery,
"For somebody's left some crumbs of bread,
So my prospects are not all dreary."

"And what's a cold toe, when I've got a whole suit
Of the cunningest warm brown feathers?
I don't care if I haven't a shoe to my foot,
I'm the bird, sir, for all sorts of weathers."

"I don't fly away at the first touch of frost,
Like some of your fine-tongued birdies;
I don't think everything's ruined and lost
When the wind mutters threatening wordies."

"I don't care!" he chirped; "I don't care! I don't care;

It might be a great deal colder;
But I'm a fellow that knows not fear—
Old Winter but makes me bolder!"

Ah, plain little hardy, brown-coat bird!
Through life I'll try to remember
To meet its winters with a cheerful word,
Like thee to brave my December.

TEMPERANCE.

A vast temperance meeting assembled recently in Birmingham's historic Town Hall, says an English correspondent of the Union Signal, was second to none in importance and significance. The temperance cause is now recognized as one of the most vital questions of the hour. Reform has come within the range of practical politics, and it is a subject which Mr. Gladstone has lately characterized as one no politician dare ignore. It was not, however, to meet the leaders in the House of Commons for which that vast assembly gathered, but to greet the two women (Lady Somerset and Miss Willard) who, in the old world and the new, are endeavoring to solve the mighty problem of the world's greatest ill, to rally their forces around the standard of home protection. Sir James Sawyer, one of England's nobles, distinguished as a medical authority, after an eloquent welcome to your and our leaders, made a thoughtful address which deserves preservation in the scientific literature that is throwing electric signal-flashes into common life and into the temperance cause. The following is an extract from the address:

"As a physician and as a citizen I deplore the evils which are wrought amongst our people by the alcoholic poison. I deplore these evils in common, I believe, with all physicians, and in common, I hope, with all thoughtful citizens. We know that our jails, our workhouses, our hospitals, our lunatic asylums and our asylums, for idiots receive a large proportion of their inmates in consequence of the destruction which alcohol works on men's minds and on their morals, their bodies and their fortunes.

"Will you allow me to impress upon you a great and particular danger which the drinking of alcohol brings with it? Medical science, by the aid of microscopic research, has made great progress during the last ten years in the knowledge of the causes and cure of many common diseases. We have learned that many diseases owe their origin and characteristics to minute micro-organisms which come to us in the food we eat, the fluids we drink, the air we breathe, the clothes we wear or the things we touch. These micro-organisms find their way into the blood and tissues of the living human body and multiply there, and each kind of them produces in that body its own characteristic and special disease. There is one kind of micro-organism for typhoid fever, another for erysipelas, another for consumption, and so on. Each produces its like and its own and no other, just as a cabbage comes from a cabbage and a cocoanut from a cocoanut.

"Now, how is it, seeing that these noxious micro-organisms are so numerous and so prevalent, that we do not oftener fall victims to them? We have found out the reason. There are within our bodies, in our blood and in our tissues, numberless little cells which protect us. These cells are known as leucocytes. When a healthy leucocyte meets a disease producing micro-organism, when this little guardian of our health and of our lives meets his enemy in the gate it becomes very active to destroy it; it spreads itself out, encompasses the micro-organism, takes it within itself, and consumes it.

"We have found out, too, that many agents have a paralyzing action upon leucocytes and destroy their power of dealing with the micro-organisms of disease in the way I have described. One of these agents is alcohol. So you may be sure that if you are in the way of infective disease, your risk of taking that disease is increased if your body be in the least degree under the influence of alcohol."

It may be appropriately added that the above cause is cited by other famous scientists for the frequent fatal result of disease is an habitual drinker.

NOT ALL PROFIT.

The following paragraph is from the Pall Mall Gazette, dated London, Dec. 13, 1892. It is significant of more than its surface reveals: "The profits of the Chicago Brewing and Malting Company for the past year do not permit of any distribution on the ordinary shares, but the directors are hopeful as regards the future. The 'beer war' and preparations for the Chicago World's Fair are the reasons given for this disappointing result. The Bartholomae Brewing Company (of Rochester) has been more fortunate, ten per cent being paid on the ordinary shares. A thorough examination of the accounts of the branches and agencies disclosed the fact that certain of the assets, including debts, casks, bottles, etc., have been overvalued to the extent of £28,938, and the directors have written off this amount."

GRAPE CULTURE IN EUROPE.

Vineyard culture in Europe occupies, in the aggregate, a large area of its land. According to a report compiled by the French Statistical Bureau, the vineyards of Europe cover 22,973,902 acres; Italy leads with 8,575,000 acres, followed by France with 4,592,500 acres; Spain with 4,012,500 acres; Austria and Hungary with 1,637,500; and Germany with 300,000 acres. The annual average production of the European vineyards is put at 2,652,300,000 gallons; Italy produces 697,000,000; France and Spain, each, 608,000,000; Austria and Hungary, 208,000,000; and Germany 51,000,000. It would be vastly better for the people of those countries if this large area of land now given up to vineyard culture for wine-making purposes, could be used instead for wholesome table fruits or for grain and breadstuffs. It is not only a misuse of the land, but the product in the way of alcoholic wine, works incalculable injury to those who consume the wines.

A COSTLY BOTTLE.

One of the most cruel things which wicked men can do is to sell strong drink to ignorant heathen savages. Thousands of barrels of strong drink are sent from Europe and America to Africa to poison the benighted Africans; and of late strong drink has been sold in Alaska to the Indians, and has produced most ruinous results. The government has prohibited such sale, and now and then a man gets what he deserves. Stephen Merritt, of New York, who visited Alaska, says he saw a man sent to prison for nine months for selling a bottle of whisky.

He was fireman on the ship in which Mr. Merritt sailed; and when he went on shore in Alaska he took a bottle of whisky which cost him a dollar, thinking to make something by selling it for a larger amount. An Indian woman bought the whisky and paid him two dollars, so he made a dollar; but he violated United States law, and soon found that he was "out of a job," and was landed in jail for nine months. Mr. Merritt and others tried to persuade the officers to let him off with a fine, so that he could keep his place as fireman where he was needed, but they refused, and so was sent to jail. If every man who sells whisky either to the savage or the civilized, in Africa, America or Alaska, could be landed in jail for nine months, the people could afford to board them there, pay them a salary and take care of their families at home, and make more money by the operation than this sailor did selling a bottle of whisky for two dollars.—The Safeguard.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The vision of the golden candlestick.—vs. 1-3. The mental endowments of Haggai and Zechariah, the two prophets of the restoration, were widely different. The former was plain and matter-of-fact, almost prosaic in his words of utterance; the latter much more nearly fulfills our conception of a seer—one with poetic as well as spiritual insight, who sees visions and dreams dreams. Yet they were both necessary. One was the complement of the other. Haggai roused the people, by his plain, practical words, to go to work and build, while Zechariah inspired their flagging enthusiasm and gave them fresh courage by his rapturous visions of the temple's future glory. So God has a use for each one's peculiar gifts. We would not want all the birds to be nightingales, or all the flowers roses. The earnest, practical, matter-of-fact mind, and the more poetic and ideal nature are both needed in Christ's service, and the one is not to despise the other. We all know that when a great work is in progress, which is beset with many hindrances and discouragements, the temptation is always to blame the leaders that it does not go on faster, when (in fact) they may be doing all they possibly can. This seems to have been the case at the time Zechariah was given his vision of the golden candlestick. It was only one phase of their lack of faith in God that the people had lost faith in their God-appointed leaders. The candlestick was one, signifying the Jewish church in its unity. A bowl upon the top of it,—the fountain of supply. So Christ is the Head of his church. The seven lamps, like the seven churches of Revelation, denote variety in unity. The seven pipes are the various channels through which divine grace flows. The two olive trees primarily refer to Joshua and Zerubbabel, but in their broader meaning seem to be suggestive of the two witnesses in Rev. 11:4, which has been thought by many commentators to refer to the Old and New Testaments,—the Law and the Gospel. We have here, in a beautiful figure, the true Christian, represented by the lamp which goes not out, because his spiritual life is being constantly fed by prayerful study of the Holy Scriptures. The seven pipes show how various, yet complete, are the channels through which God's grace is conveyed to the believer. Sometimes it is through joy, sometimes through adversity and sorrow; often by means of a sermon or a hymn, and quite as often through the common discipline of daily life. Each lamp is, like the candlestick of which it is a part, made of pure gold; no sham about it, but solid throughout; gold which has passed through the fire and reflects the Refiner's image.

2. The true source of power.—vs. 4-7. Zechariah was not afraid to confess his ignorance to the angel, but he asks, with the simplicity of a little child, to have the meaning of the vision explained to him. So humility must ever go before true wisdom. "Not by might, nor by power," etc. The lamps did not keep themselves burning. They were sustained only by continual fresh supplies of oil poured through the golden pipes. So it is only by fresh supplies of the Spirit that any important thing was ever done for God, from building the temple down to the vast work carried on by a Muller or a Spurgeon in our own time. "This is the word of God unto Zerubbabel," but it is no less the word of God to every individual Christian. As the work was begun through government aid, it was not strange that the Jews were inclined to lean on an arm of flesh, and hope for another Cyrus instead of putting their trust in God. "Who art thou, O great mountain?" What are all the hindrances in the way, even though Satan stands by our side to resist the work, and all the powers of the world engage in active opposition? They shall become plains; that is, be entirely removed. "And he shall bring forth the headstone," the last crowning touch, thus gloriously completing the work. So Christ is not only the cornerstone, but the head-stone of his church. He is the first and the last, the Alpha and Omega.

3. The promise of completion.—vs. 8-10. "His hands shall also finish it." This is a lesson of hope and encouragement to every individual Christian. Mere human workers must often be content to let other hands finish the work they began; not so with Him whose years are eternal. When he begins a work of grace in a human soul he will surely finish it. It is human nature to despise the day of small things, but this is God's appointed way of working. He hides the giant oak in a feeble acorn, and the mightiest reformations have always had an insignificant starting point. Luther was not born great; he was only a miner's son. So of Lincoln, and others who achieved grand results because God was with them. The reforms and reformers of to-day may look small to us; they will look large in the eyes of a future generation. The Masonic anti-Christ may boast himself impregnable, but "who art thou, O great mountain?" Faith will make that, and every other anti-Christian power that seeks to hinder the establishment of Christ's kingdom, become a plain.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

CONGREGATIONAL.

—The net gain in the membership of the Union Park church, Chicago, for the past year has been 165. The total membership is now 1,271.

—The West church, the latest addition to Chicago's churches, was organized provisionally last Sunday on West 42nd near Fillmore street. It is in a new and growing West Side neighborhood.

—Sunday, Dec. 8, was the 25th anniversary of the pastorate of Dr. E. P. Goodwin, and the services on that occasion were appropriate and full of interest. Last Thursday evening, Dr. and Mrs. Goodwin were tendered a cordial reception by their church associates and personal friends.

—The Pecatonica, Ill., church surprised its new pastor, Dr. L. N. Stratton, and his family, Dec. 12, by giving them a hearty reception visit and numerous substantial gifts.

FRIENDS.

—The people of Bachdat, in Syria, who some time ago became Protestant, and requested the Friends of Mount Lebanon to accept them, have refused the solicitations of Bishop and Patriarch and French Consul to return to priestcraft and tyranny, notwithstanding tempting offers of money and various "advantages." The Friends labor among them.

LUTHERAN.

—The Almanac of the General Synod for 1893, edited by Rev. Dr. Sheeleigh, gives the following statistics of our church in America. There are 66 orphan's homes and eleemosynary institutions; 10 young ladies' seminaries; 42 academies; 32 colleges; 26 theological seminaries. There are 150 Lutheran periodicals divided among the languages as follows: 55 English, 51 German, 17 Norwegian, 16 Swedish, 4 Danish, 1 Icelandic, 4 Finnish, 1 French and 1 Hungarian. The Tables for the Lutheran church as given, are: Ministers, 5,102; congregations, 9,119; confirmed, 1,234,762.

—The Lutheran church supports 40 missionary societies, 700 stations, 1,000 missionaries, 4,000 native helpers; has 204,000 baptized members, 1,600 schools, and 60,000 pupils; and expends in the work $1,100,000 annually.

—The Lutheran Standard, printed at Columbus, Ohio, celebrated the fiftieth year of its existence, on the 7th inst., by issuing a handsome memorial number. The Standard is ably edited and an efficient advocate of Lutheran principles.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—Bishop Mallalieu was greeted at Hing-hua, China, in a novel way. A large number came out several miles to meet him and escorted him into the city with a Chinese band, gongs, flags, banners, and the firing of fire-crackers, while thousands of people witnessed his triumphal entry on the streets and crowded around the chapel to hear him speak and preach. The church was crowded with Christians and heathen at every service.

—The recent term of Northwestern University was prosperous in all departments. Six new professors were added to the faculty in the college of liberal arts, and three in the college of law. The new laboratory building, in connection with the medical college, is nearly completed. An addition to the woman's hall is also nearly finished. The plans and money are ready for a new library building to cost $100,000. It will be built during the coming year. Arrangements have been begun for a polytechnic school.

—At the Baltimore yearly meeting of Friends, Missionary Bishop Taylor, of the M. E. church, was introduced and gave a most interesting account of his mission field and how he worked it. First, by establishing mission farms and workshops, so that the stations may not only teach the arts of more civilized life, but become self-supporting. Secondly, by taking little children before they become heathens, and bringing them to Christ from infancy.

—Recent statistics gathered from the five annual conferences in the State of Texas show a most prosperous year, perhaps the most prosperous in its history. There has been a clear gain of 6,137 members, and notwithstanding the drouth a gain of $145,376.36 in collections. There are eighteen Methodist pastors in San Antonio.

—Miss Frances E. Willard is making a deep impression in England. English exchanges contain notices of the marked effect of her speeches. The Wesleyans of London recently gave her a reception in St. Martin's town hall, London, at which were present leading men and women of the British Methodism. Dr. Stephenson presided.

MOODY'S GOOD WORK.

—D. L. Moody, the evangelist, who has just returned from Great Britain after an absence of fourteen months, finds a necessity for enlargement of his Girls' Training School at Northfield. He has decided to open additional rooms for new applicants without change of terms, the regular rate per term of three months being fifty dollars, which includes room, board and tuition. He will receive twenty-five students, selected by Christian Endeavor societies at the rate of thirty-five dollars a term. He has also determined to offer ten free scholarships for the use of worthy applicants for the next term of the school, which opened January 5. The aim of the Training School is to give such a course of instruction as will make Christian women more useful in the service of Christ. Dressmaking, household science and cooking are also taught.

SALVATION ARMY.

—A few weeks ago Adj. Martin and five Salvationist women officers were arrested at Basle, Switzerland, for holding meetings. After being in prison a week they were brought to trial and sentenced to a three weeks' imprisonment. Notice of appeal was at once given, and the prisoners were at once released pending the decision of the Court of Appeals. The principal papers of the land have arranged themselves on the side of the Salvationists.

—There are over 800 Salvation Army bands in Great Britain.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—Fifty years ago there were engaged in missionary labors among the heathen, supported by Protestant foreign missionary societies in Europe and America, 1,250 ordained missionaries and 60 female helpers, 170 native pastors and 3,000 native helpers. The number of communicants gathered from heathendom was 185,000, of schools established 2,600, and of pupils 120,000. The annual contributions for the cause amounted to $3,000,000. At present there are 4,300 ordained missionaries and 1,700 female helpers; 3,300 native pastors and 32,000 native helpers; 780,000 communicants; 13,000 schools, and 740,000 pupils. The annual contributions exceed $12,000,000.

—The issues of the two great Bible societies of the world—one in England and the other in America—up to April 1st last, were 183,387,489 copies, and of the lesser societies 46,614,511 copies; in all 240,000,000 copies since the year 1804, the year of the organization of the British and Foreign Bible society. The total issues of the Bible societies of the world for the last year amounted to more than 7,000,000, or more than enough to distribute a fresh new copy to each inhabitant in the Empire State. The average existence of the two great Bible societies is eighty-two years, and during this time the receipts have amounted to more than $82,000,000. The average cost of the two great Bible societies is about forty-four and three-quarter cents.

—The recent statistical quarterly statement of the German empire reports the latest religious data of the country. According to these Germany has 31,026,810 Protestant subjects; 17,674,921 Roman Catholics; 145,540 other Christians; 567,884 Jews; 562 adherents of other religions, and 12,753 without any religious profession. The total population is 49,428,470.

—A revised version of the Apocrypha, from the same hands that revised the Old and New Testaments, will soon come from the university presses of Oxford and Cambridge. This was a part of the original plan entered on in 1872 for the revision of the Bible.

—A little more than fifty years ago Prof. Delitsch translated the New Testament into Hebrew. Ten editions have been issued, the last comprising 200,000 copies. This is an efficient means of labor among the Jews.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

CHICAGO.

By the careless handling of a revolver, Joseph Rush shot and killed his six-year-old little boy.

Mrs. M. C. McDonald, the discarded wife of the great Chicago gambler, has written a book in which some startling revelations about prominent individuals are promised.

The board of control of the Exposition adopted, Saturday, the jury system of awards.

A Milwaukee avenue grip-car ran into a funeral procession and wrecked the hearse.

Mayor Washburne has determined to put an end to the incivility of his subordinates, not only toward himself but toward a long-suffering public. As a result of this determination, City Engineer L. H. Clarke and John W. Coghlan, chief clerk in the engineering department, tendered their resignations as public officials. Coghlan's was an aggravated case.

Mayor Washburne and a delegation of the Chicago common council visited Washington last week to advocate the opening of the World's Fair on the Sabbath. They were joined and supported by Rev. Dr. Thomas of Chicago, Rev. Mr. Lewis of New Jersey, and a large delegation of interested and influential men from Boston.

W. B. Conkey will publish the World's Fair catalogue. He expects to print 10,000,000 copies. One thousand men will work on it. About 200 carloads of paper will be used. Ten sets of plates will be made. Six of them will be kept in Mr. Conkey's establishment. The four remaining ones will be locked in safety deposit vaults in different parts of Chicago.

A company of capitalists has been formed which proposes to bring the Platte river by canal from Fremont to Omaha, thus developing about twenty-five thousand horse-power, which will be used in manufacturing enterprises and in operating street cars, etc. The enterprise is a stupendous one, as it involves a canal forty miles long and a viaduct across another river, the Elkhorn.

Mr. James S. Judd succeeds his father as editor of the Orange Judd Farmer. He has been specially trained for this work, and has been the practical editor of the paper for more than a year.

President T. W. Palmer, of the National Commission, believes that the World's Fair will be completed on time, and that all the engagements entered into by Chicago when it made pledges to Congress with reference to the Exposition are to be completely fulfilled.

Another consignment of 200,000 World's Fair Souvenir half dollars was shipped here, making in all 1,200,000 thus far received. The kegs containing the coins were placed in the vaults of the World's Fair people.

An accommodation train on the Eastern Illinois road was run into by the Chicago and Erie express Friday night, near Fifty-fifth street. The accommodation train consisted of three coaches containing about one hundred and fifty suburban residents on their way to their homes, and scarcely any escaped bruises. Eighteen were seriously, perhaps fatally, injured.

Henry S. Codman, landscape architect and one of the most efficient members of the construction department of the Exposition, died on Friday at St. Luke's Hospital. The direct cause of death was a surgical operation performed last Wednesday, and until late Thursday evening the sick man was thought to be improving.

COUNTRY.

The Great Northern railway is now completed, the first train running from Spokane Falls to Seattle, Washington, on Thursday, January 12. Cold and snow have hindered the work.

The second national conference on university extension was held in Philadelphia, Pa. Many prominent educators from all parts of the country were present. The leading address at the opening session was made by Pres. Henry Wade Rogers of the Northwestern University, who gave a spirited account of the extension of the university movement and the possibilities it unfolds for American education.

A call has been issued for a conference of Christian Prohibitionists, to meet in Philadelphia, January 24, 1893, to consider the attitude of the church toward the liquor traffic, and if possible, to suggest a remedy for the present indifference of the followers of Christ.

Yale College has 1,969 students this year, as compared with 1,784 in 1891. This year's freshman class numbers 507, against 468 a year ago. The average estimate for general expenses has been lowered from $615 to $551.

A resolution was passed in the Michigan Legislature to appoint a committee to advance the interests of the State in the World's Fair.

The Pope has decided to establish a permanent apostolic delegation in the United States, and has nominated Mgr. Satolli to be the first delegate.

It is believed that the loss of life in the St. Louis Hotel fire at Duluth, Minn., is greater than at first reported.

A coal combine has been formed to create a monopoly of the output of the Nova Scotia coal fields.

United States Senator Kenna, of West Virginia, died in Washington last week, at the age of forty-five. As he was a member of the Roman Catholic church, funeral services were held in the Senate chamber, conducted by Cardinal Gibbons, who was assisted by Bishop Keane, a corps of twenty priests, and a retinue of acolytes and choir boys. The ceremonies were on a more imposing scale than those granted to Senator Barbour in May last. That occasion was the first when the Catholic ritual was ever read in the United States Senate chamber.

Justice to All.

It is now apparent to the Directors of the World's Columbian Exposition that millions of people will be denied the pleasure of becoming the possessors of

World's Fair Souvenir Coins

The Official Souvenir of the Great Exposition—

The extraordinary and growing demand for these Coins, and the desire on the part of the Directors that equal opportunities may be afforded for their purchase, have made it necessary to enlarge the channels of distribution. To relieve themselves of some responsibility, the Directors have invited

THE MERCHANTS

Throughout the Nation to unite with the Banks in placing Columbian Half-Dollars on sale. This is done that the masses of the people, and those living at remote points, may be afforded the best possible opportunity to obtain the Coins.

THE FORTUNATE POSSESSORS of SOUVENIR COINS will be those who are earliest in seizing upon these new advantages.

$10,000 Was Paid For The First Coin

They are all alike, the issue is limited, and time must enhance their value. The price is One Dollar each.

HOW TO GET THE COINS:

Go to your nearest merchant or banker, as they are likely to have them. If you cannot procure them in this way, send direct to us, ordering not less than Five Coins, and remitting One Dollar for each Coin ordered.

Send instructions how to ship the Coins and they will be sent free of expense. Remit by registered letter, or send express or post-office money order, or bank draft to

HOME AND HEALTH.

PRACTICAL HINTS FROM A WOMAN.

My own experience does not make me think that sprinkling salt on a carpet before sweeping is a good plan. It seems to cause it to gather dampness, and soon causes it to mold. I do not think it a good plan to wet the broom, to sprinkle with tea leaves, or do anything that wets the dust down, for it only soils the carpet more, and after it dries it will fly through the room again. Sweep the carpets as clean as possible each time they are swept, going over them the second time if necessary to get all the dust, but don't wet it down and leave it.

To keep out moths, put corrosive sublimate cut with alcohol on the floor and in the cracks before the carpet is laid, but be cautious in using the poison, for it will exterminate people as well as moths and bedbugs.

For removing the stain of perspiration from underwear, apply a pretty strong solution of soda and then rinse repeatedly with clear water.

Always grease the bread dish before setting sponge for bread, then it will not stick to the dish.

Gasoline takes out grease spots the best of anything I know of, and does not leave a stain, except where the colors run badly. Care must be taken in using it, not to get too near a fire, as it is highly explosive and very inflammable. It must be used with expedition, as it evaporates rapidly. It is said to be good to exterminate bugs and moths, but I have never tried it.

Housewives understand how convenient a boiled dinner is. A baked dinner is also economical of time. Put a roast of meat in the oven. Have baked potatoes, baked apples, baked pudding and baked squash if you like.—Mrs. Loretta E. Turner, in Farm, Field and Fireside.

THE "TRIFLE."

This is a pretty dish and very easily prepared. Take slices of sponge cake, or any similar plain, light cake, and even if the cake is a little bit stale, it will not matter. Put a layer of cake in the bottom of a large, shallow glass dish, and spread over it a very thin layer of strawberry or raspberry jam. Have a few sweet almonds blanched and slit down lengthwise, and sprinkle some over the jam; now put another layer of cake, then one of jam, and then the rest of the almonds. Pour over all enough smooth, cold boiled custard to just cover the cake, and set all away in a very cold place. Have some cream sweetened and flavored with vanilla or anything else you prefer, and set it away in a cold place also. Just before sending to the table, heap the trifle dish as full as you can pile with the whipped cream, avoiding any thin part of the cream that may have settled at the bottom of the bowl.

WHAT TO DO WITH THE LAMPS.

Keep them clean.
Fill the lamps each morning.
Look especially after the burner.
Do not try to burn old, gummy, dirty oil.
Lamps having metal bowls are best and safest.
Have a good wick, and keep it properly trimmed.
Do not fill a lamp when burning—it is dangerous.
Use the best oil to be had; it is the cheapest, the cleanest, the safest.
In case of accident, keep cool, and attend to business right away.
Have a closet for the lamps and their belongings, and keep them there.
Trim off that portion of the wick which has been burned out—no more.
In getting new burners, see that there is a perfect fit; also in regard to the wicks.
Do not live from "hand to mouth;" have a good supply of everything not of a perishable nature.
Handle the lamp carefully when aflame; it is an invaluable friend, yet contains elements of disaster.
Never turn down the lamp so low that the combustion is imperfect; it poisons the air beyond endurance.
If a lamp tips over and is not broken, right it immediately; if broken, pick up

FARM NOTES.

RAISING TOMATOES UNDER GLASS.

Tomatoes flourish in greenhouses during the spring and early summer months much better than in winter. The crop is mostly gathered during May and June, at which time 16 to 20 cents per pound is realized.

This is less than half the price paid in winter, but owing to the decreased cost of production and greater demand, there is more profit in a spring than in a winter crop.

In order to have plants ready to fill the houses as soon as the last crop of lettuce is out, tomato seed is sown about the last week in December. Seed is sown in shallow boxes, not having more than two inches depth of soil. As tomatoes require considerable heat, these seed boxes should be kept in a warm part of the greenhouse.

Soon after the plants have formed the second leaves they should be transplanted. For this purpose the same kind of shallow boxes are used as before, and in these the young plants are set about two inches apart each way. If kept growing nicely the plants will begin to crowd each other in three or four weeks, when they should be again transplanted. This time they are to be set about four inches apart each way. The same kind of boxes may be used as before, but greater care must be taken to keep the plants watered than when younger, as more water is required because of the greater amount of foliage. During all stages of growth in which the plants are kept in boxes or flats, a good method of watering is to place the boxes of plants in a shallow vat, holding a small quantity of water. If these plant boxes have slatted bottoms, as they should have, the water soaks up evenly through the soil, and in a more thorough and satisfactory manner than when surface watering is practiced. The only precautions that need be observed in following this method is not to water until the plants require it, and not to keep them soaking after the soil is fairly wet. If desired the plants may be set in four-inch pots or in large beds at the second transplanting, instead of into boxes, but the latter plan has some advantages over the others.

Early in March the plants ought to be a foot in height, and just coming into bloom. They are then ready to set in permanent beds for fruiting.

These beds should contain about six inches of soil. The plants are set about twenty inches apart each way, and in order to occupy the ground fully lettuce plants are set between. As soon as the lettuce is cut the tomato plants are given the whole space. The soil should be stirred frequently, and it is advisable to mulch the surface with half-rotted manure. An important part of the care of the crop consists in pruning and training. The plants must be tied to some support and the tying must be repeated as often as required, as the plants increase in height. Stakes may be used for support, or strings may be tied to the rafters, and the lower end fastened to short stakes driven near the plants and the plants tied to these strings. The side shoots near the base of the plants must be removed as they appear and the plants kept trained to single stalks, or, if preferred, two shoots may be allowed to start from each plant, but in any case the surplus suckers must be removed as they appear. This pruning hastens maturity and makes possible to grow the plants within the narrow limits named. It is not necessary to remove any foliage, unless it becomes diseased, in which case it is better off than on, as it does no good, besides it is unsightly and serves to spread the disease.

As before stated, tomato plants are less subject to disease late in the season than early, but the best preventive of disease is good care so as to keep the plants growing thriftily. A fair crop when grown in this manner is about five pounds per plant.

This cannot be rated as a highly profitable greenhouse crop, but when it is considered that it is grown at a time when the houses would otherwise remain idle the reason for growing it is apparent.

CURED

"About seven or eight months ago I was attacked by a cough, and at once began to take a medicine much advertised as an expectorant, and continued using it until I had taken about six bottles. Instead of giving me relief, it only made me worse. I tried several other remedies, but all in vain, and I don't think I had three whole nights' rest during my illness. I began to think that had laid hold of me, and my hopes of recovery were all gone. I was a mere skeleton, but a friend of mine, who had been some time away, called to see me. He recommended me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and kindly sending me a bottle, I took it, but with little hopes of recovery. I am thankful, however, to say that it cured me, and I am to-day enjoying the best of health."—J. Wilmot Payne, Monrovia, Liberia.

A letter of unusual interest from Rev. M. A. Gault, describing a recent visit to Rev. B. Caradine, D. D., at St. Louis, with other incidents, is printed in this issue of the Cynosure.

From Bro. W. B. Stoddard's excellent letter, in another column, it is evident that our friends in Pennsylvania are alert to have an inspiring State Convention at or near Pittsburgh in the latter part of February.

As we go to press, Tuesday, delegates to the Illinois State Anti-secrecy Convention are gathering at Coulterville, Randolph county. Judging from the very full program printed in last week's issue, there is every reason to believe that the convention will be an event of great interest, and every way a success.

Congress is called upon by the committee which has been investigating the combine of the Reading and other Eastern railroads to control the output and price of coal, to make it the subject of national legislation. This is right. The report of the committee asserts that the aim of the combination is to drive out independent coal operators and obtain a complete control of the anthracite coal industry, and that it is sought to do this by the fixing of a high freight rate on coal so as to make it profitable for individuals to turn in their product of the mines to the combination. The report will also recommend the passage of the bill heretofore agreed upon by the commerce committee, which gives the interstate commerce commission power to keep down freight rates.

The killing of a Chinese laundryman named Jun Din Kok, in this city last week, led to a suspicion that he was the victim of the Highbinders' murderous fraternity. All efforts by the Coroner to establish this fact proved futile at the inquest; but (he said) "I am positive that Jung Jack Lin was sent to Chicago for the express purpose of killing this man, but these fellows stick tight to each other, tighter than brothers, and you can't get anything out of them." The man Jung Jack Lin is held for trial as the murderer of the dead laundryman, and it is possible that further information may hereafter be elicited concerning this crime.

The country mourns the death of ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes, at his home in Ohio, last week, at the ripe age of seventy years. As a soldier and statesman, and as a private citizen, his unassuming character and fidelity to duty created for him a large cordon of admiring friends, whose tributary expressions are filled with encomiums of which any American citizen might well be proud. In him the man arose above the politician; and to him and his estimable wife, who preceded him to the grave, his countrymen owe an administration more than usually free from intemperance at the White House, and one highly promotive of the best interests of the social and moral circles with which their position surrounded them.

Among prominent suspects in the celebrated Cronin murder case was James F. Black, more notorious under the name of Frank Woodruff. He was arrested with other participants in that crime; but as no particularly damaging testimony against him could be discovered, he languished for only a few weeks in jail, and was then claimed by the State authorities of Kansas as a horse-thief. He was taken to Olathe, tried and convicted. Another charge of a similar character was proven against him, and he was sentenced to the penitentiary for a brace of terms of two and five years each. While serving his term in that institution he died. Woodruff was a great prevaricator—a fabricator of romances relating to his share in the Cronin murder. Among his last statements was one that he drove the horse and wagon containing the corpse of Crofin, but that he did not know the nature of his load, or that Cronin was to be assassinated. Woodruff does not leave many survivors of that terrible tragedy behind him.

Dr. Geo. E. Shipman is dead. This announcement will bring sadness to many hearts in whose recesses this Christian gentleman and his noble work are tenderly enshrined. A stroke of paralysis, a little more than a month ago, a fall, and a subsequent attack of erysipelas, with weeks of suffering, brought him within the shadow of death, where his gentle spirit lingered until last Thursday evening, and then took its flight to a happier sphere. There are records of useful lives and peaceful deaths inscribed in all the records of time, and now among them brightly stand those of Dr. Shipman, the founder and untiring, praying, working manager of the Foundling's Home in this city. The good he has done in faith, love and perseverance is mainly embodied in the history of this excellent institution. It filled his heart, it exercised his powers, and enlisted all his sympathies and impulses in behalf of the forsaken infants of the city, who will rise up and call him blessed. To live and die in such a cause was worth a thousand kingdoms won by fraud and violence; and while we revere his memory, we may each profit by his example.

Home Rule is in the ascendancy again in Great Britain and late dispatches indicate a revival of interest in the subject in connection with the near re-opening of Parliament. The home rule which the government proposes to give Ireland is said to be "real in quality and generous in quantity." In detail, it is stated, the electoral laws of the whole kingdom are to be altered and modified in the interests of democracy. The people are to be given some sort of control over the liquor traffic. London is to have a further installment of municipal home rule, and local autonomy in the rural districts is to be enlarged. Among other information which the ministers have given to the public relating to home rule, are the differences between the Irish home rule bills of 1886 and 1893. The old proposition that the Dublin Parliament consist of two orders, one representing the aristocracy and the other elected by popular suffrage, has been materially altered. The counties will elect the members of the first order, but they will sit and vote with the commoners. Mr. Gladstone will meet Parliament with his original majority reduced from forty to thirty-five. The most promising of recent developments is the reconciliation of the Scotch and Welsh malcontents with the minority. This was accomplished by Mr. Gladstone accepting the Scotch memorial asking that Scotch measures be referred to a special committee of Scotchmen. Lord Wolseley has decided to retire from the military command in Ireland if a home-rule bill be passed. Mr. Gladstone has asked Mr. McCarthy to get the Irish party to sit on the government side of the house. Changed conditions, hereafter, may defer the anticipated results of the government's policy.

WOMAN'S PLACE IN REFORM.

ADDRESS BY ELIZABETH E. FLAGG, AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE NEW ENGLAND CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, DEC. 14, 1892.

My subject is a very broad one, and it may also seem, at first glance, to be rather vague and ill-defined. I will frankly confess that I have been puzzled to know just where to locate the first woman reformer. So I went to my Bible—for I believe God's Word is all about reform and reformers from cover to cover—and I opened at the first chapters of Genesis. Reform, as we all know, means to make over; and as I read the story of the Fall, I saw that the need of such work must have begun as soon as Adam and Eve left Eden.

Now a very high Masonic authority—I believe it is Dr. Oliver—has told us that the principles of Masonry were first imparted to Adam in Paradise; therefore Adam was the first Mason. He does not tell us that Eve was the first "cowan," though he certainly leaves us to infer it. However that may be, I claim Eve, the mother of the human race, through whose folly in listening to the serpent "came death and all our woe," as the first woman reformer; for to her first came the glad promise of salvation through a risen Redeemer. And, embracing it by faith, she went bravely forth to meet what lay before her:—thorns and thistles instead of roses, and desert sands instead of Paradise. I believe she did not waste any time in vain regrets, but made the best of things as she found them—just as multitudes of her daughters have done ever since in leaving the comforts of civilization behind them to found new homes in the wilderness. Certainly Eve was the first home-maker, and all reforms which amount to anything must begin in the home.

But in Old Testament history there is one name which glows with the white heat of a soul at once purely patriotic, nobly heroic, and devoutly religious. It is that of Deborah, the woman-judge of Israel. Let us go back over three thousand years, back to the gray dawn of the world's youth, and hear what she has to say—she who could lead an army, and write the triumphal ode for a nation—on this question of woman's place in reform.

She judged Israel "under the palm tree." Here is a suggestion that I feel tempted to enlarge upon. When Deborah comes into our town meetings, and our city councils, and our legislative halls, we shall find flowering plants, and mottoes on the wall, and a sweet odor of moral cleanliness where the air now reeks with tobacco smoke and profanity. There will be no vile spittoons standing around, outraging health and decency. The Deborahs do not train in that company of weak and foolish women who pretend that they are indifferent to having tobacco smoke puffed in their faces, when they ought to take it as an insult. The palm tree under which Deborah judged Israel may well stand for hygiene, for sanitary laws, for social purity, for wholesome living, for all that the W. C. T. U. is battling for in the homes and public places of our nation. It is said that the desert palm is unique among trees in this particular; that with its slender taproot it will pierce to such immense depths below the burning sand that it finally reaches a spring of water and brings it to the surface, and in a little while there will be a circle of verdure all around it. I know of nothing that so beautifully illustrates the deep and far-reaching work of the W. C. T. U.; and now the question which presses with ominous significance upon the Christian voters of the land to-day is this: Will you continue to sit under the upas tree of license, dropping poison dew, its shade a haunt of every venomous, crawling thing? or will you lay the ax to its roots, and choose the palm tree of Deborah in its stead, which lifts its sunkissed, star-crowned head to heaven, and the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations?

Deborah was a wife, and presumably a mother. Woe to the oppressor of the fatherless, the widow and the stranger! Woe to the betrayer of innocence when she sat on the judgment seat with her man's brain and her woman's heart! Though if there was a class of men in that day answering to the liquor-sellers and their political allies now, I have no doubt they said that Deborah ought to be at home rocking the cradle, and leave such matters to the men—by which, of course, they meant themselves. Very likely King Jabin and Captain Sisera both thought Deborah completely out of her sphere, and perhaps they even said she was unsexing herself—just as if it were possible for any woman to do that! But Deborah believed thoroughly in home protection;—just as thoroughly as do our white-ribbon leaders now, and like them she was wise and brave enough to see that there was one thing that was even more important than homekeeping, and that was that she have a home to keep.

A cruel foe was in the land. He had nine hundred chariots of iron, perhaps armed with sharp scythes to mow down all opposition, as the chariots of conquerors often were in those days. Now suppose the enemy had come to her with some such proposal as this: "We will kill and maim as many of your people as we can; we will make orphans and widows by thousands; we will send untold agony and suffering into multitudes of happy homes, but we will pay a handsome sum annually for the privilege." Can you imagine for an instant his having the face to go to Deborah with any such proposition? And I wonder what she would have said, this woman-judge in Israel, if she had been asked to license a traffic which is doing all this, and more; if she had been asked to shut her ears to the cries of little children starving, freezing in their wretched homes;

"Of women sobbing out of sight Because men make the laws," and hear only the clink of those blood-stained shekels as they were poured into the nation's treasury? No; I don't wonder, for such a proposal could never have been made to her. One of the most infamous bills that ever disgraced Great Britain's legislative annals, though it was finally smuggled through Parliament, and became a law by deceit and fraud, was kept off England's statute book twenty years because the men who wanted it said, "It's of no use. The Queen will never sign such a bill; we don't dare to lay it before Victoria and ask her to put her name to it." I wonder how many bad laws would have been kept off America's statute books if only her uncrowned queens had been given their royal right of veto?

Where is woman's place in reform? It is wherever reform needs her. And when was the call for Deborahs louder than it is to-day? Our nation is in peril, not from one Sisera, but from a score of Siseras. Rum leads one mighty army. Romanism leads another; trusts and combines, and secret labor unions lead still another; but who is the King Jabin back of them all? that shields the rumseller and divides the prohibition hosts? that is masked under the black coat of the Jesuit, and whose grip on the world of business and trade to-day is such that literally the words of Scripture are fulfilled; no man can buy or sell save he that has the mark of the Beast or the number of his name.

To-day one Deborah is not enough. We want scores, we want hundreds, we want thousands. Every mother ought to be a Deborah for the sake of her boy. Just think! Statistics tell us that there are a million young men in our churches to over a million in our jails, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred rum brought them there. Almost every mother dreads the open saloon for her boy; but is the secret saloon with a tyled door any better? Isn't it a thousand times worse? Native pride and self-respect, as well as love for his mother, and regard for her teachings, will be likely to keep your boy from the snare of the open bar-room. But in the secret chambers of the lodge, surrounded by men who drink and smoke and tell vile stories, what can you expect? That he will have the courage to withstand their ridicule? or will he swallow his scruples, and smoke his first cigar, and drink his first glass of liquor, and so take his first step in the downward way to ruin?

Furthermore, every mother is called to be a Deborah for the sake of her daughter. We want protection for our girls as well as our boys, and for our boys as well as our girls. Both must meet temptation. What mean these dark hints that reach us from time to time in regard to the increase of drinking habits, as well as the terrible opium curse among the women of our large cities? women, too, of wealth and culture and refinement. What means it when we see the lodge reaching out after the daughters of our nation, trying to ensnare them with flatteries, inventing side degrees, and in a thousand ways trying to draw them into its slimy embrace? Why, it means the old story of Eve and the serpent over again, and humanity cannot afford to have it repeated.

Again. Every woman whose eyes have been opened to see our national perils, is called to be a Deborah for the sake of somebody's else boy and girl. Oh, my sister woman, if you have no loved ones liable to be crushed under the iron chariots of King Jabin, just remember that not a moment passes over your head but the soul and manhood is being crushed out of "somebody's darling;" and you fold your hands and think it doesn't matter anything to you, and you go on with your fancy work that sooner or later will only be food for the moths, and your fancy cooking to make more suffering dyspeptics. The keenest, hardest, bitterest thing that was ever said about us women always seemed to me to be that remark made by Ruskin in his Lecture on War: that if the usual course of war, instead of unroofing peasants' houses, and ravaging peasant's fields, merely broke the china on our own drawing-room tables, no war in civilized countries would last a week. I am afraid it is true, and that is the worst part of it. I once heard of a woman in Kansas who refused to register so that she could cast her vote at municipal elections. She "did not want to vote," she said; she "had all the rights she wanted," and her husband could represent her well enough at the polls. There are plenty of women like her, and they ought to be shamed out of their selfishness. You see, she hadn't a thought for that great army of women who don't have all the rights they want, and whose husbands represent them only in the bar-rooms and at the police court. All at once she changed her mind and concluded she would register. The secret of it was this. She had a beautiful home with finely-kept grounds, and the cows in that place were permitted to run at large. She did not want them damaging her grounds, and she found that when it came to getting a vote against the cows two votes were better than one. But do we want to wait till a question touches our selfish interests before we know ourselves, and make the world around us know whether we are for God or for Baal?

For we are called to be Deborahs for the sake of One whom we must love far better than son or daughter if we would be worthy of Him. We want His kingdom to triumph. We want Zion to put on her beautiful garments and go forth conquering the world for Jesus. But how can she do this when she is weakened and defiled through entangling lodge alliances with the secret lodge? Why are the heavens brass above us? Why have the showers of divine grace forgotten to fall as in times of old? And when we do have so-called revivals, why is the old miracle of Gideon's fleece repeated, so that the heavenly dews fall only on one part—the female part of the community—and leave the other half untouched? We need a host of Deborahs in the church as well as in the state. For we have so many Baraks in our pulpits. They are good men, they are true men, they are even brave men, after a fashion, but they need the Deborahs to stir them up. And don't let any of these dear women who are not called to public service, who do not write for the newspapers or speak from the platform, imagine that they are left out of this glorious army. Why, they are the bone and sinew of it. Take a woman whose whole soul is enlisted in the battle against evil, and there will be something in her mere presence, nay, in her very silence, that will make the enemy quake. The story is told of Lucretia Mott, that at one time a fugitive slave case was pending, and the judge so feared the silent influence of her mere presence on the jury so much that he kept them up all night, hoping to tire her out and make her leave. But when the gray light of dawn came stealing into the court-room Lucretia Mott still sat there; and with her face before them they could not, they dared, not remand the trembling fugitive back to bondage any more than if it had been the face of an angel of God. And they set him free.

It is time that every woman had "a realizing sense," as our good fathers and mothers in Israel used to say, of the responsibility laid upon her simply through the fact of her having been born in this age of the world. When Daniel Webster was giving his famous address on Bunker Hill, the crowd was asked to fall back and make more room, but they were so densely packed they seemed an immovable mass; and they answered back, "It is impossible. We can't do it." Then Webster came to the front, and he said in that wonderful voice of his that penetrated to the outskirts of the assembled multitude, "Nothing is impossible on Bunker Hill." And the crowd fell back as one man. So nothing is impossible to American womanhood standing on the vantage ground of this nineteenth century. Clouds and thick darkness may envelop her way, but the voice that speaks to her is never an uncertain voice, and the call that summons her to the conflict is a bugle call.

Lo! on the distant hilltops

His standard-bearers gather,
And the solemn centuries listen

To the mandate that they bring:

"Bid the daughters of the nations
March forth beneath their banners,
And marshal in their cohorts
Where the hosts are gathering.

"There is danger on the ramparts,
There is rout upon the war-field;
There is wrong and woe in all the land,
And stain upon our shield;
Bid the silent hosts come forward,
Come from their voiceless thresholds
And battling for their hearthstones,
Bear My standard to the field.

"Shall his fiat fall unanswered
Along the silent highway?
Shall His mandate drop unechoed,
And His heralds lick the dust?
No; not though thrones should topple,
Though the battlements should falter,
Though the sceptres should be shivered,
And earth's crowns should sink to rest.

It is written in the heavens,
It is carved upon the mountains;
And the thunders of the ages
Send their echoes on before,
And the tides roll swift and certain,
As the rivers from their fountains,
And human right shall rule the earth,
And wrong sit shrined no more.

The Deborahs of to-day are called to fight an enemy to which King Jabin with his nine hundred chariots of iron was a man of straw. For they "fight not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." At one time a certain missionary station in Africa was given a grant of land by a Christian chief; but it happened that a Purro lodge—the name which the Africans give to their principal secret society—was located on the site, and everybody was afraid to cut away the bush around it. They believed that something—I don't suppose they knew exactly what themselves, but something dreadful—would happen to them if they disturbed it.

But after all these poor, ignorant savages were a good deal like some white people I know, who just as soon as anything is said against Masonry begin to shake in their shoes. But a daughter of Bishop Crowther had charge of the mission, and this colored Deborah seized a cutlass, and with her own hands began to cut away the bush; and as her sturdy strokes let in the light of day on this secret stronghold of Satan, the men forgot their fears and began to help her—as they always will when a woman leads the way.

To-day Deborah is saying to Barak: "Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded, saying, 'Take with thee ten thousand men of the children of Naphtali and of the children of Zebulun. And I will draw thee to the river Kishon, Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army with his chariots and his multitudes, and I will deliver him into thy hand.' Ten thousand did not seem a large number under the circumstances, but it was large enough to rout King Jabin's army. The call is waxing louder and louder for a new reform party;—one that will stand pledged against the secret as well as the open bar-room; against Romish attacks on our free schools, and Masonic corruption in our courts of law; that is not afraid to put the name of Christ in its platform and keep it there, instead of voting it out at the command of lodge-men, as the Prohibition party did in New York a year or two ago. That is what is wanted; that is what we are praying for, and that is what we are going to have one of these days. But numbers will not make its strength.

We have just been passing through a political overturn, and I know that many good people are feeling very blue about it; but let me tell them for their consolation—and the sooner they realize it the better—that this is only the beginning. The Lord is going to keep on overturning and overturning, until out of the broken fragments of all the parties, new and old, he evolves the ideal party of the future, which is going to deal with the lodge question, and the labor question, and the liquor question, and the Romish question, and every other great moral problem of the day;—deal with them boldly, justly, righteously, not shirking a single one. As to the Democratic party, I believe that it is going to exist until we have the millenium. You know the good old lady who found something to praise even in Satan—his industry and perseverance. So there is something to praise even in the Democratic party. We always know where to find it;—and that is exactly behind the age. It is like the old settler's clock which he could always tell the time by, "for when the hands show twenty minutes past ten and the old thing strikes four," said he, "then I know it is just a quarter to one." So when the hands on the old Democratic clock point to midnight then you may be sure that the day-star has arisen, and tints of rose and pearl are beginning to flush the east, and the birds are singing, and the flowers sending up fragrance from their thousand censers, for the hour of dawn has struck on the dial-plate of human liberty and human progress.

But why did Israel need a Deborah? She herself tells us in her wonderful triumph song. "They chose new gods; there was war in the gates." Well, that is just what our American Israel has done, and this is the reason why we are in such need of Deborahs to-day. The nation has chosen new gods; gods which our fathers knew not of. And is there not war in the gates? Look at Homestead. The echoes of that unholy strife have not yet died out of our ears. Look at six different States and Territories put under military rule in one year. Look at Rome drilling her secret legions. What is she doing it for? Our fathers in their time of darkness and trouble went to God for help, and they found what they sought. "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and delivered him out of his distresses." His ears are ever open to the complaint of the poor. He has said in his holy Word, "I hate oppression." Is it possible to use any plainer English than that? He has said, "I will be a swift witness against them that oppress the hireling in his wages." He has said, "Go to now, ye rich men; weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you . . . Behold, the hire of your laborers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth, and the cries of them which have reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth." Oh, what an Almighty Friend the laboring man has in Jehovah! But instead of seeking to him for deliverance they have chosen another god to go before them. They have gone into the secret labor lodges, even the sons of Puritan fathers, and offered incense at their Christless altars. Is it strange that the Lord thus insulted and provoked has seemingly turned to be their enemy? that he has delivered them into the hands of King Jabin, and given them over to be ground under the iron chariots of the greedy, grasping monopolist, and the alien hordes of paupers and criminals from southern Europe?

But let me quote again from Deborah's song. "The princes of Issachar were with Deborah," but Gilead "abode beyond Jordan," and Dan and Asher stayed in their snug, safe harbors. How many Gileads are there in our own land every election-day who stay at home and shirk their duty at the polls? It is said that if fifteen hundred of the professed Christian men of Boston had not stayed away from the polls this last election, the city might have been redeemed and be no longer what it is now—the plague-spot at the heart of our commonwealth. How many American voters are like Dan and Asher, so snugly anchored in one of the old parties that they can't make up their minds to leave it, even when God and their country calls them? But the princes of Issachar are with Deborah. Don't let us forget that. Oh, these princes of Issachar! What could we ever have done without their aid? How in times of trouble and darkness, when the enemy was most vaunting, they have stood by our side with their prayers, with their money, with their brave words of inspiration and cheer! I see many of these princely sons of Issachar before me to-night, and I thank God for what they have done, and for what they may yet do. But who will be helpers of Deborah in their places when the great Captain calls them to higher service? One by one our gray-haired veterans are passing over the river. In the glory of their young manhood they fought the serpent of the still at a time when "teetotaler" was a term of reproach. They stood shoulder to shoulder with the noble Deborahs of the anti-slavery conflict, in the face of ostracism and persecution, and mob outrage. They were not afraid to lead a forlorn hope. They were not afraid of unpopular causes. I appeal to every young man who may hear me to-night: "Are you standing to-day where they stood in those times that tried men's souls? Secret false worshipers are doing for our country just what they did for ancient Israel;—weakening her so that she cannot stand before her enemies as they come rolling in upon her shores in a tide of squalid vice, and ignorance, and red-handed anarchy, from the dens and slums of the Old World. God demands of you and your country demands of you that in this crucial hour you make a brave fight against the secret foe in her gates;—that you be helpers of Deborah. Will you stand up and be counted for God against the hosts of Baal? And may it be said of you, each and all, when the conflict is over, and her pæans of victory float up to the celestial battlements to mingle with the song of Moses and the Lamb, "THE PRINCES OF ISSACHAR WERE WITH DEBORAH."

THE CHRISTLESS LODGES.

Rev. M. A. Gault, the efficient reformer, and president of the National Christian Association, has an article on "The Christless Lodges," in Our Banner (Ref. Presb. magazine), of Philadelphia, for December, 1892, in which he says, speaking of the recent Wahoo (Neb.) anti-secrecy convention:

It was my first attempt to work up a convention in the interests of this movement, and I undertook it with some misgivings. The influence of secret organizations is far more powerful and widespread in the West than in the East. Their controlling power is increasing in all political parties, in the large majority of churches, and in all trades and branches of business. In many localities it is almost impossible to get a position in a school, or in business, or even as a pastor of a church, unless the applicant has the mark of this beast and can give the necessary grip.

During the ten years I have been in the National Reform field, I constantly felt their secret undercurrent of opposition, and longed to be in a position to fairly and squarely meet it. I was warned at our last Synod by some of my good brethren that if I took up this work I would be spotted and socially ostracised for life,—that open opposition to secret societies was not the best method of dealing with this evil; because the more they were thus opposed the more they increased, etc., etc. But in our Wahoo convention we not only made opposition to secret societies the main theme, but almost the exclusive theme on the program, and took the boldest and most uncompromising stand against them. From the commencement to the close our speakers aimed their strongest arguments at the very heart of this system. Never have I heard more unsparing blows dealt in the face of this iniquity than in the addresses of Dr. D. H. Coulter, Rev. Thomas Chalmers, Rev. Joseph W. Morton, Prof. S. M. Hill, Rev. John M. French, Rev. W. C. Paden, and Rev. W. I. Brooks. And what was the result? Was it social ostracism? No, it was just the reverse. The best people of Wahoo crowded the Covenanters church until many were standing. The Academy professors and students adjourned their exercises and attended in a body. The best musical and elocutionary talent among the young people of Wahoo came forward and cheerfully did their best to make the program interesting. A good delegation of ministers and others, representing various churches, came up from distant parts of the State, and all in all it was the best convention I ever held. Rev. W. C. Paden and I were invited the Sabbath before the convention into the Presbyterian, Congregational and Swedish Lutheran pulpits of Wahoo, where we preached and made the fullest announcement of our convention. We received much larger contributions and many more subscribers for the Cynosure, the organ of the movement, than we would have received at a National Reform convention. At a meeting here in Blanchard last week, in the U. P. church, when Bro. Paden and I spoke on the anti-secret issue, we had the house filled—a larger audience than we ever had at a National Reform meeting here. It was even larger than Rev. W. F. Crafts had when he spoke on the Sabbath question, or when ex-Governor St. John spoke on prohibition. My experience so far is that it is easier to secure an audience and co-operation and open doors for the presentation of the anti-secret question than the National Reform question. The reasons are, the anti-secret question is a great, practical issue. It is resistance to a powerfully-organized enemy, entrenched in every city and town, menacing the life of both church and state; indeed, in many places it is, on the part of the church, a fight for dear life. And wide-awake reformers are beginning to realize that the most powerful influence to educate men to exclude Christ from politics is the great secret society system, embracing more than two hundred secret orders and more than five million members, exerting a more powerful influence than all our churches combined. The great majority of these secret orders are false systems of religion, with Christless altars and rituals, Freemasonry even going so far as to strike the name of Christ from his own Holy Word, in texts quoted in their rituals. The National Christian Association has for more than twenty years been uttering a persistent and uncompromising testimony against this powerful anti-Christ, and God's blessing has attended their work, and the people manifest a growing confidence in the movement.

But why is it that so many have lost confidence in the National Reform movement, so that our own church last year contributed but little more than $3,500 for this work, about one-seventh as much as it contributed to send the Gospel to Syria? I fear one reason is because we have not testified as we should against the greatest enemy of National Reform, this Christless lodge system. We have given the people too much reason to think that we have compromised with this evil. Some of our vice presidents have been Freemasons. A prominent Freemason on the program of one of our conventions spoke in favor of Masonry. One of our lecturers employed by the National Reform Association for years was a member of several secret orders. I was warned last summer by one of the most influential leaders of the National Reform Association that I must not bring the anti-secret question into my National Reform discussions,—that when a man accepted the National Reform platform we had no right to raise the question whether he was a Mason or not. Thus while we testified against Christ-rejecting constitutions we failed to testify against its twin evil, if not its mother evil, viz., Christ-rejecting lodges.

The National Christian Association occupies higher ground on this question, for its platform is so constructed that no member of a secret society can stand on it, although it does not exclude those who have sworn supreme allegiance to Christ-excluding civil constitutions. But the National Reform platform excludes neither. This inconsistency on the part of those who claim as their chief object the recognition of Christ's claims in government, has tended to destroy the confidence of thorough-going reformers in our movement. In the storm that is already upon us every organization must go down except those that are out-and-out for Christ.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The trained nurse.—The late Gen. Butler and Mr. Durant.—Our imprisoned missionary in Brazil.—A Romanizing change.—Freemasonry and Rome.—Cambridge and her city fathers.—The liquor business non-political.

One of the greatest institutions of the present day is unquestionably the "trained nurse." I was looking the other day at a photograph group of graduates from the General Hospital in Boston, with their trim muslin caps and dainty white aprons, and thought that no college in the land, not even Vassar or Wellesley, could show a finer array of earnest young faces. What a world of progress is implied in the very adjective, "trained," since the days when nurses were supposed to be like poets, "born and not made," and therefore not to need any training. Now the next step—and the wonder is how slow we are taking it—is "trained help." I do not see that cooking schools and cooking classes are solving the problem to any great extent, for it is neither Bridget, nor the American girl who intends to adopt housework as a profession, whom we find there represented. Quite often they are the wives and daughters of rich men, who take it up as they would china painting, and with as little idea of making it their life work. So the problem remains apparently as far from solution as ever. It is evidently the intention of Providence, sooner or later, to bring in the era of co-operative house-keeping, or the question would have been solved ere this.

It is said that the late Benjamin F. Butler, brusque and savage as he might be with his brother lawyers, was always perfectly lamb-like in his demeanor when Henry F. Durant was the opposing counsel. It has been pronounced a mystery, this singular power which Mr. Durant seemed to possess over his irrepressible contemporary. And yet to me the reason seems plain enough. The man whose name will always be associated with Wellesley College, though in accordance with his wish it has neither bust nor picture of him, had a curious personality,—a kind of dual nature. His features, smooth and delicate as a woman's, together with an exquisite refinement of voice and manner, made his relentless logic and keen sarcasm like the proverbial "hand of steel under the velvet glove." There was also about him a certain indefinable atmosphere, like what we are told encircled Washington, that forbade either bullying or an impertinent familiarity—bade it so effectually, in fact, that I cannot imagine anybody, even a Ben Butler, daring to cross the magic boundary. The General as a lad is said by those who remember him to have been "weak, sickly, and averse to quarrels," which shows that "the boy" is not always "father to the man," Pope to the contrary, notwithstanding. But isn't there something a bit heathenish in the way Huntington Hall in Lowell was draped when the General's body lay there in state;—in "hangings of the direst black," shutting out all the light, and "falling in a massive sweep" from the centre of the hall to the sides, and then perpendicularly to the floor. Here is the way the report reads: "A hollow, vaulted roof of black, a circular wall of black meeting the eye on every hand. Not a light broke the expanse of darkness, save in the centre of the roof one solitary circle of gas jets, dropping an unearthly light on the dead face just beneath." Gen. Butler was a high-degree Mason, but never attended his parades or celebrations, and I have seen no account as yet of their participating in the funeral ceremonies. With all his faults he was genuine and hated shams.

Probably he rated their tomfoolery at what it was worth.

It is difficult to understand why a government which made so much of the Chile affair has nothing to say to Brazil regarding the imprisonment of Mr. Nelson, who is a member of the N. E. Southern Conference, a graduate of Boston University, and his wife a Massachusetts woman, for simply calling the worship of Mary "idolatry." To be sure, it isn't a very great while—the years can be counted on the fingers of one hand—since the enlightened city of Boston sent one of her most scholarly and devoted Christian ministers to jail for a year, for preaching the Gospel to the poor on her public grounds. As Mr. Nelson's term of imprisonment is only four months, Para in Brazil makes on the whole a better showing. I would not have guns brought to bear on Para, as an anti-Romanist exchange desires, for I am a thorough believer in the principles of peace; but I would have our government speak out in thunder-tones regarding such an outrage to one of her citizens; and if Rome had no more footing in Washington than it had seventy-five years ago I think Brazil would hear from her.

It is said that the change of our Annual Fast from the first Thursday in April to Good Friday, will be agitated in the Massachusetts Legislature this winter, and that it will be championed by Gov. Russell. Far better give up the day altogether than to introduce a change so entirely in the interests of Rome. To legalize the observance of Good Friday is to unite church and state, the chief point at which she aims; and this union once begun, who is enough of a seer to predict where it will end. And by the way, why are the Freemasons so exceedingly sensitive over the Pope's late encyclical against them? It looks suspicious. Suppose that venerable old gentleman of the Tiber should issue a bull directed especially against the Presbyterians, for instance; would they give it any more notice than to smile at its utter futility, and go right on with their psalm-singing, as unmoved as the very crags and moors which the blood of their covenanting ancestors has forever made sacred soil? Would Freemasonry show all this anger and excitement if she had not the slightest affinity with Rome? if, in short, all her tlightest and history were so much opposed to the papacy that she could not reasonably expect anything else? If she cared not in the least for Rome's smiles would she be likely to be so disturbed by her frowns?

Cambridge has been recently making some unpleasant discoveries respecting her city fathers. Think of an alderman and a member of the police committee urging the admittance of a police inspector who happened to be his friend into the smoking and gambling club to which he himself belonged, on the plea that by so doing the club would be safe from raids! Editor Buckley of the Cambridge News had enough courage and fearlessness to make these facts known, with the result of a libel suit, which brought out not only his complete vindication, but a revelation of "rottenness in Denmark" which ought to make the respectable and virtuous citizen blush that such things should be. What an overturning there would be in these corrupt city governments, and what consternation among these poker playing, beer-drinking politicians if the unexpected should happen, and our legislature give the right to vote at municipal elections to women! No wonder they are bound to defeat it if they can.

An instance of the liquor-men's cool contempt for law is the refusal of the Massachusetts' Wine and Spirit Dealers' Association to make a statement, as they are legally obliged to do, of the large sums expended by them at the last election. They are purely a "business" and not a political organization—so they say—and do not consider it necessary that anybody should know what they expended in their "educational" campaign for license. This reminds one that Freemasonry also has a fashion of claiming to be non-political, and the most vehemently at the very times when she is putting in some of her liveliest political work.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 18, 1893.

The army which came here to urge the passage by Congress of legislation allowing the World's Fair to be opened on Sunday is apparently in a half-whipped condition. A majority of the committee before which the hearings for and against Sunday opening took place stand ready to make a report in favor of Sunday opening, but those who are managing that side have decided, after a canvass of Congress, that the proposed amendment would be defeated if it came to a vote at this time, owing to the public sentiment against it which has been aroused by the religious press and the pulpit orators of the country, and that, in the language of one of them, "It will be better to wait a few days until the feeling against Sunday opening has cooled a little" before getting the question before Congress. There are reports to the effect that the Sunday openers have concluded to abandon the attempt to gain their object by direct means, and will try to do it by means of an amendment to some obscure bill during the rush which always precedes the end of a session of Congress. This may or may not be true; but the opponents of Sunday opening are on the alert and do not intend to be defeated in any other way than by a direct vote.

Several notable national conventions are in session in Washington this week. First in importance, probably, is the National League of Good Roads, the object of which is to improve the condition of the roads throughout the country. Senator Manderson is president of the league, and deeply interested in its work. The others are the National Board of Trade, and the National Woman's Suffrage Association.

Arrangements are now being made for a convention of the Christian Endeavor Union of the District of Columbia, which now has seventy-odd branches, all in a flourishing condition, on January 27, 28 and 29. The remarkable growth of this organization in the Washington churches has been a great pleasure to our people.

The solicitor of the treasury has decided that the Columbian Exposition has not yet been formally opened, and consequently that the law against Sunday opening is not violated by the present Sunday opening of the grounds and the charging of an admission fee.

The House passed, this week, the joint resolution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Mr. John Phillip Quinn, the reformed gambler, has been giving some very interesting talks to the young men of Washington, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. He gives them ocular demonstration that all the so-called games of chance are in reality games of certainty—that is, that the professional gambler wins as often as he wishes. Of course such exhibits as accompany Mr. Quinn's talks are entirely unnecessary in dealing with the young man who can be persuaded to abhor gambling because of its moral depravity, but they serve a very useful purpose in convincing those young men who cannot be reached by moral suasion (and unfortunately there are too many such), that it is impossible for them to gain anything by gambling. It is but an exemplification of the old-time maxim of using the devil's weapons to fight sin with.

There are apparently no bounds to the impudence of the organized liquor-dealers. They appeared this week, through their attorneys, before the House Committee on the District of Columbia and presented a license bill, prepared by themselves, which they wished the committee to favorably report to the House of Representatives, as a substitute for the bill which was passed by the Senate at the last session, and which is opposed by the liquor-dealers because of the severe restrictions it places on the selling of intoxicating liquor. This is something new. It is usually customary for Congress to give hearings to those likely to be affected by pending legislation, but it is not usual for those against whom correctionary legislation is aimed to present a bill drawn up entirely in their own interests and request that it be enacted into a law, as the liquor-dealers have done. These men have no idea that their bill will be passed, but they know that it will help to consume time; and the more time that will be consumed between now and the fourth of March the more likelihood that the session of Congress will end without any legislation on the subject, leaving the present mixed-up and inefficient laws to stand for another year.

The bill recently introduced in the House to prohibit divorce in the District of Columbia has been adversely reported upon.

REFORM NEWS.

IN CHURCH AND FACTORY.

THE SWEDISH AMERICANS MAKING AN HONORABLE RECORD.

In the midst of other work for a World's Fair Congress and exhibit; for deputations to the N. C. A. conference, to which the churches are appointing their own delegates; and in aiding the Students' Bureau of Correspondence in its important work, I have spoken lately in two prominent churches of the Augustana Lutheran Synod.

On Sabbath evening, January 8, Rev. M. C. Ranseen welcomed me to his congregation, and supplemented the plea for separation from the demon-worship practiced about lodge altars with a generous collection. Bro. Ranseen has an interesting and steadfast congregation, which surrounds him with an excellent body of Christian helpers in the work of the church and Sabbath-school. The church is commodious and generally well-filled.

The pastor is among the best-known of the Swedish Lutheran ministers, both within and without his denomination. He has been president of the State conference, and is much engaged in promoting the new Swedish hospital on the North Side of this city. He is also frequently called upon to represent his denomination in union meetings for Sabbath promotion or other like movements, and is one of Dr. Barrows' committee on the religious congresses at the World's Fair. He feels the pressure of the lodge upon his young men, and welcomed an address that would help them understand more clearly the relation of secret orders to the church, and endorse more heartily their prohibition by the Lutherans.

The following Sabbath, Rev. A. Challman made a kind reception for a similar discourse to his people in Batavia, Ill. The Swedish people are quite numerous in this city, and their services are in great demand in the several wagon, windmill and paper factories that border the Fox river. Employers understand their separation from the secret orders, and know they can be relied upon, when workmen of other nationalities, controlled by their secret oaths, and ruled by walking delegates, are liable at any unreasonable notion of these petty despots to drop work. Bro. Challman has known some experiences of this kind in Batavia that would puzzle Dr. Funk and his editor of the prohibition Voice to answer. The attempt of the latter to yoke prohibition to secret trade-unionism is sure to destroy the great temperance movement if it shall prevail. The effort of the Voice in this direction should be rebuked by every sincere Prohibitionist.

HENRY L. KELLOGG.

REV. M. A. GAULT IN ILLINOIS.

SPARTA, Ill., Jan. 19, 1893.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Perhaps the most popular address at our Wisconsin State Convention was that by Rev. S. H. Swarts, of Chicago. It was so practical and full of kindness and human sympathy, and delivered with an earnest unction that captured the audience from the start.

The address of Rev. Isalah Faris was also one of great power. He gave me the privilege of preaching from his pulpit at Vernon on the next Sabbath—the church where, at the age of eighteen, I first went to the communion-table with my father and mother, and where I spent seventeen years of my early life. It was sad to miss so many of the companions of those early years. Many have moved away, and many have been called, we trust, to the upper sanctuary. But there are still a goodly number holding up the old banner.

After my sermon, one devoted young man, E. I. Dewey, with his family, who have recently united with this congregation, was so interested in the cause that he handed me, through his pastor, $5.00. He reads the Cynosure; and the next Tuesday evening, by extraordinary effort, he worked up a good meeting for me in Temperance Hall at Big Bend.

The next Sabbath found me at the Lisbon U. P. church, near Sussex, where, in spite of the extreme cold, I met a good audience; and a good old mother from Scotland, Mrs. Elizabeth McGill, was so interested that she gave me $5.00 in addition to the collection. Here I was the guest of my niece, Mrs. Edith Will, who, with her husband, are devoted friends of our cause. They had the kindness to name their dear little boy after me. They are so interested as to request that we hold a local convention in their church and have faith to believe that a good strong influence can be rallied here.

Wednesday I spent with our secretary, Bro. Phillips, in Chicago, arranging for our Illinois State Convention. No secretary's services to me in the field have ever been one-half as valuable as those of Bro. Phillips.

The next evening found me at Coulterville, Ill., where I addressed a good meeting in Rev. J. R. Wylie's church, and where I was glad to find everything promising for our coming State Convention.

The next evening I spoke in the Tilden U. P. church, the pastor of which, Bro. R. E. Wilkin, was a student with me at Monmouth College.

The next day I went to St. Louis, to, if possible, secure the help of Dr. Carradine at our convention. I found him threatened with nervous prostration, and in such feeble health that it was with difficulty he could perform his regular church work. His little daughter of six years answered the door-bell and gracefully ushered me into the sitting-room, and then brought her father down from his study. He is below medium size, has dark eyes, is of middle age, is very courteous and friendly in manner, and looks the hard worker and close student that he is. He regretted that he could not speak at our convention, owing to his feeble health, but assured me of his growing interest in the cause. His church is a fine, large, gothic, stone structure at the corner of Glasgow and Dayton streets. He is quite an author, and several publishing houses are realizing good profits on his books.

What excites the reformers' admiration for this man is his wonderful courage. While a minister in a denomination that perhaps more than any other is dominated by secret lodges, and pastor in a congregation and a city where the secret empire is very strongly entrenched, he had the boldness to preach his great sermon against the secret orders. Our times afford few, if any, such instances of moral courage. We are selling thousands of this great sermon in our meetings. No anti-secret publication is in such demand, for it contains the strongest objections to secret orders, stated in the most popular form.

On the train, returning from St. Louis, I enjoyed the company of Rev. Wm. Weir, who, providentially, is giving a course of lectures in Southern Illinois on National Reform. He is arranging to attend and speak at our State Convention, next week. He is the only lecturer now employed by the National Reform Association, and his whole heart is in the work.

M. A. GAULT.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

NOTTOWAY C. H., Va., Jan. 18, 1893.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—We are having a remarkably cold winter for Virginia; the thermometer has been 4 degrees below zero here. This morning it is 2 degrees above. The ground is everywhere white with snow, although it is but a few inches deep. This state of the weather causes a good deal of suffering among the poor people and animals that are not accustomed to such cold.

Notwithstanding the rough weather I took a trip to Chase City, Mecklenburgh county, on the last day of the old year. On New Year's day I was at Thyne Normal Institute, and assisted in a short Gospel service in the afternoon. This school is sustained by the United Presbyterians, as a mission among the Freedmen. They have a large college building, and other fine halls, and 300 students in the various departments.

The Rev. J. H. Veazey is the president of the Institute and is assisted by a number of accomplished teachers. They appear to be doing a large and important work. I spent one day in visiting the classes in their recitation rooms, and in the evening spoke briefly in their temperance meeting.

Mr. Veazey is a very able and successful educator; he is also an earnest reformer; and I made arrangements to send to his reading-room some anti-secrecy volumes, and a copy of the Christian Cynosure for a year.

I preached at Jetersville on the 8th, but I have done very little since on account of the severe weather. My health is very good; for which I thank the dear Saviour.

Yours,
S. F. PORTER.

REV. WILLIAM FENTON'S WORK IN MINNESOTA.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Jan. 20, 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—My last letter from this State was dated at Kerkhoven. The town hall of that place was secured for a lecture, and the lecture was delivered. At least one Odd-fellow and one Mason were present, and when asked to deny what was said, the jewels, "silence and secrecy," were kept by the fraternity, and the condemnation of Christ manifest: "And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil: For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved."

Soon after a crank had thrown a dynamite bomb at Russell Sage, a man called upon another millionaire and peremptorily demanded a large sum of money of him, or his life. The millionaire calmly took in the situation at a glance; and not knowing what moment a dynamite bomb might explode at his feet, he treated the man very kindly and soon requested to be excused from his office for a few moments, when he procured an officer to arrest his visitor.

Visits to pastors sometimes remind me of that circumstance. Some pastors fear the truth as millionaires fear dynamite bombs. I have just returned from a visit to Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, pastor of Westminster Presbyterian church. He is a graduate of the U. P. Seminary at Xenia, Ohio, and of course he is not a fool; therefore he knows that Freemasonry is a "damnable thing". He has lately come to this city, and was installed pastor last night. Freemason Carson, pastor of the Central Presbyterian church, preached the installation sermon. Pastor Hutchinson

CORRESPONDENCE.

INFORMATION WANTED.

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa, Jan. 1893.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—In Rev. J. M. Foster's address, printed in the issue of Dec. 29, the statement is made that after the abduction and murder of Morgan, which caused the vast majority of its members to leave the lodge, "Masonry fled to the South and allied itself with slavery. The Southern Confederacy was conceived and brought forth in the lodge. The boys in blue went South and crushed the rebellion, but brought back the lodge."

The late President J. Blanchard made the same assertion and reiterated it time and again. This I do not understand. I lived in Ohio till I was 24 years old, and as far back as I can recollect of noticing public events, I heard of Masonry and Odd-fellowship and their lodges being in existence in my native county, and those adjoining; and I supposed it was so all over the State. Two members of the church of which I was a member joined the lodge, Odd-fellows. Our pastor preached a sermon against secret societies, showing their evils and defending the position of the church (Associate Reformed) on the subject. The two members (brothers) left the church and continued in the lodge.

When I came to Iowa, in 1856, I found Masonry and Odd-fellowship here also. The lodge may have been more numerous in the South than in the North before the Rebellion; but I am under the impression that it had greatly revived and was rapidly gaining strength again in the North, long before the Rebellion occurred. But in this I may be mistaken. And as two of our noblest and best reformers have made the same assertion on this subject, I would like to have an explanation of it.

CHAS. REYNOLDS.

THE TREND OF ANTI-SECRECY SENTIMENT.

EXTRACTS FROM OUR CORRESPONDENTS AND EXCHANGES.

"I may say that Ronayne's lectures here did a great deal of good. They opened the eyes of the people and let them see the great sin and iniquity of Masonry. Several of them afterward became converted to Christianity and left the lodge." "Masonry has not ruled our town so much since as it did before Ronayne's visit here. So you see that a great deal of good came out of it, after all the excitement." "You may tell Mr. Ronayne that nearly all the Masons who took such an active part in inciting the young people to mob and rotten-egg him when here have passed away to 'the lodge above,' most of them coming to an untimely and bad end." "I have taken the Cynosure ever since Ronayne's lectures."—Correspondent's name withheld for obvious reasons.

MONROE, Wis., Jan. 16, 1893.

I have a few suggestions to make on our lecture work. I made two great mistakes. I would remedy them by calling, at the close of every lecture, a show of hands: that is, ask all who are opposed to secret societies to raise their right hands. Then, before I left, I would form all such into a society for the discussion and reading up of the secret fraternities; explain to them the literature of the various societies, and get them interested in buying it for their own information; urging them, also, to loan their books to others who would read them. I would also advise them to scatter the tracts published by the N. C. A. over the land. In this way you would soon have hundreds of persons throwing abroad light on these dark orders, where now you have only here and there one. I would require every lecturer to do this.

ISAAC BANCROFT.

CRESTON, Ill., Jan. 16, 1893.

The more I see of the workings of secret societies in our country, the more I abhor them; and the idea that so many of our ministers of the Gospel unite with and adhere to Masonry is simply terrible. I cannot see that it is worse to tell a lie than to play a lie; and when a Mason is initiated into the third degree, they play that he is dead; which is a lie; and when the fellow-crafts sent to raise him—the one reporting that the flesh slips off from the "dead" man's hand, and the other that the flesh cleaves from the bone—both lie, and Hiram Abiff is accessory to those lies. Yet Masonic preachers claim to be good, honest men! There is a great deal of sham and falsity in this world.

IRA METTLER.

Secret societies are covering the land, as the plagues did Egypt, in the days of Pharaoh. There is not one of them to which a Christian can consistently belong. The best of them is selfishness organized. The only inducement to join them is the offer of some advantage which could not be realized in the ordinary turn of affairs, and which therefore one may not fairly claim. A true Christian wants no position, no property to which he is not justly entitled. He cannot deprive others of their rights in order to build up himself. He is not a parasite, stealthily appropriating for his support the nourishment which others have provided for themselves. He is willing to eat his bread in the sweat of his own face.

Secret societies, organized with the avowed object of effecting reforms, are hypocritical in their pretensions and disappointing in their results. Poisons are prepared in the dark: wholesome food in the open kitchens. He who came to reform the world declared: "I spake openly to the world: I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing."—Jno. 18:20. His disciples follow his example. The deadly malaria is dispelled by sunshine. Evils, political, social and moral, are removed by letting in the light upon them, and not by brooding over them in seclusion. "Nothing," said Daniel O'Connell, "can be politically right which is morally wrong." Secret societies attempted to improve the government of France. They ended by their members cutting each other's throats. The Jesuits undertook to meet the reformation of Luther by secretly reforming the Romish church.

The result has been the establishment of a secret order which is the mightiest persecutor of Christianity that Satan ever introduced among men.

Then, have nothing to do with secret societies. Put not yourself into the power of masked men. Before you give any pledges have a clear understanding what these pledges are. If you let another put fetters upon you, be not surprised if he takes you where you would not wish to go. He who would follow the Lord must not make himself over into the hands of men. Darkness brings condemnation. It is only while we walk in the light that the blood of Christ cleanses us from all sin.—Rev. B. T. Roberts, in the Earnest Christian, for January, 1893.

The rum traffic has been fought for years, and temperance people have been disappointed and baffled in the results. For forty years every saloon-keeper in Albany, Mo., with perhaps one exception, was a lodge man. The liquor brewers and venders, as a rule, are Freemasons; and it is a very costly experiment to create public sentiment against the saloon, through lodge agencies, and a far more difficult matter to enforce prohibition through lodge agencies and officials, even after attained. Not only are the saloon-keepers and distillers lodgeites, but Roman Catholics as well.

The rum traffic of America to-day is doubly entrenched, not only in the Masonic lodge, but in the Romish confessional. Worth county spent much time and money for the best speakers, to gain only three votes over four years ago. Sobieski and other strong speakers, at no little cost, were in Gentry county and the vote was less than in '88. Since the publication of the American Freeman ceased, the lodges of this county have been steadily growing. The county at one time gave Nick Ford, a Roman Catholic and wholesale liquor dealer, a majority for Congress, sent T. H. McKinney to the Legislature, made Kernan McKinney county judge, McCarthy, of Stanberry county, prosecuting attorney—all Roman Catholics—and other Romanists here have been placed in office time and again.

The fact is, that when lodgery and Romanism ascend in any community, all righteousness stops short or retrogrades; and thinking men hesitate to longer sacrifice time, money and effort to fight rum alone, but henceforward purpose to grapple with the triumvirate of giant evils, that are so linked, affiliated and intertwined that the destruction of the one means the death of the other two; and to combat one means the combined opposition of the triple alliance, not only in the city, but in almost every country town and county in the nation.

Readers, do you know and realize that rum, Romanism and Masonry are allied evils, one in spirit and purpose, and at war with every good word and work, a standing menace to free government and human liberty?—G. W. Needels, Sr., in the Fire-Brand.

Samuels Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, has received an alarming and highly interesting warning from S. Heydenfeldt, Jr., who has given to the study of electro-magnetism and other pernicious arts much careful attention. "I have been informed," says Mr. Heydenfeldt, "that there are seventeen secret societies which electro-magnetize their members, who are, without knowing it, connected with a system in India, Arabia and Germany. Those who have adopted it did so, undoubtedly, without investing or studying the injury to physical and mental conditions of man. It is easy, then, to account for the nervousness and restlessness of the people of the United States, which physicians testify is steadily increasing." * * *

Mr. Heydenfeldt takes the ground that legislation and treaties, with the most severe penalties, are needed to prohibit the use of electricity on human beings under certain conditions. He believes that the magic, sorcery and mysteries of the Middle Ages have been revived among us in America, with a more scientific knowledge of electrology.

"Demonology (under the name of hypnotism) is being practiced, including the ingenerating, incubating and inhumating from distances (on a large scale, going into the millions), as well as other practices of the demons incubi. There are sects, among them the Mormons (especially the seers of their church hierarchy), whose fanatism is such that they seek to raise what is generally called the subjective condition of man (of the whole people), which is weak and subject to the mental dictation, suggestion and control of other minds, in such a manner (there being different ways) that it can be asserted over the objective by the aid and power of other minds, with or without the use of electricity, of which the objective is usually ignorant, and assumes the originality and responsibility of all thought, expression and act; which is the first step and link in lifting the spiritual power over the temporal."

In view of this disturbing condition of affairs a resolution has been taken to excite the interest and action of Congress, and to this end a measure has been drawn up, entitled "An act to prohibit electro-magnetizing, mesmerizing or hypnotizing human beings, or affecting one person through another by electricity, and to declare the same to be a crime against the law of nations, and to define its punishment." This act, in substance, provides that any person who shall "apply a current of electricity to one person for the purpose of affecting another" within the boundaries of the United States shall be deemed guilty of a crime, the punishment for which shall be death; and any person who knows that such current is being applied and does not give information to the authorities, shall be deemed an accessory, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $5,000 and not more than $20,000, and by imprisonment during his natural life, or for a term of years not less than two.

It is against such diabolism as is outlined by this bill that, doubtless, Mr. Gompers and the entire Federation of Labor are preparing to fight. How well they will succeed is a question interesting to all who will watch the experiment.—New York World, Jan. 4, 1893.

In this age of the world, when designing men covet to pervert the teachings of the Bible, in order to have it harmonize, as they would make themselves believe, with their own corrupt self-will, it is in place to show to the rising generation the dangerous byways and pitfalls that beset the way.

Masonry is becoming more bold in its declarations, claiming even that it is a religion not at all antagonistic to the Christian religion. That the popular religion of the times does, in some respects, harmonize with the principles taught by Masonry, we must admit, but as to the Bible itself, it, by no means, approaches to a similarity in the ideal god of Masonry, but utterly condemns the same. Certain moral principles enter into the statutes of Masonry, such as any moral man may espouse, even though he be out of Christ and void of the vitalizing principle of eternal life.

There can be no soul-saving essence in a god that sets up a worship and faith contrary to the spirit of the Holy Bible.

From the admissions of prominent Masonic authorities it is evident that Masonry is something different from the Bible,—in fact, rejects the teachings of Christ; and if Masonry is a religion, it has for its god something different from the God of the Bible; therefore it is in opposition to the law from Mt. Sinai, as well as to that emanating from Christ.

There is as wide a difference between Masonry and true Christianity as between the spirit of Satan and the Spirit of Christ.—J. S. Flory, in the Gospel Messenger.

"It was about fourteen years ago that I was first initiated into the lodge. Within a few months after, I advanced to the Royal Arch degree, and some time after I took the degrees of Knighthood, as they are called. I well remember the horror of my feelings when the bandage was taken from my eyes, and I found myself partly naked, with men standing around me, pointing at me the implements of death, and a human skull was handed me to drink from, and I was required to repeat words, awful in themselves, and which I cannot distinctly recollect, but which I believe to have been the same I find given in the explanation of that ceremony in Bernard's 'Light on Masonry.' From that time I absented myself from the lodge and chapter. My mind was afterwards led, by degrees, to an examination into Masonry, which, I am now satisfied, is repugnant to the spirit of the religion of Christ."—Henry Tutem, a Baptist pastor.

LODGE NOTES.

(From Secret Society Journals.)

Nebraska is agitating the question of an Odd-fellow Orphans' Home.

K. of P. halls and other property, we are informed, are exempt from taxation in Missouri.

A Masonic temple, to cost half a million dollars, is proposed to be erected in London, England.

One hundred and fifty thousand Odd-fellows have died since the organization of the order in 1830.

Daniel DeFoe, the author of Robinson Crusoe, writing early in 1700, mentions the society of Odd-fellows.

The widows' and orphans' fund in Kentucky amounts to $30,000, a splendid showing for the Odd-fellows of that jurisdiction.

On Friday evening, Dec. 30, the largest gathering of Pythians ever in a castle hall of a subordinate lodge, was seen at Aldine Lodge, Chicago, over eight hundred knights being present.

The Baltimore Telegram records the death by accident, Dec. 20, of Bro. John T. Maddox, a prominent Odd-fellow, Mason, Chosen Friend, I. O. R. M. and other orders, who joined in paying homage to his worth.

A Pythian paper prints this: "The order of the Knights of Pythias, founded just after the close of the war by Justyn Rathbone," etc. If the brother will read up he will find that Justus H. Rathbone was the founder, and that it occurred Feb. 19, 1864, and that the war did not close until more than a year later, in 1865.

There are now fifty-four Grand Lodges of Knights of Pythias—Idaho, Manitoba and Oklahoma being the latest. The year '91 gave the order of Knights of Pythias an increase of 632 lodges and 49,634 members, making a total of 4,901 lodges and 357,924 members. During the twelve months since Dec. 31, 1891, the work has been going on and we make our guess that the returns of the grand jurisdictions soon to be made to the Supreme K.R.S. for the year '92 will show that we have 5,400 lodges and, in round numbers, 425,000 members, and that the report of that officer to the supreme body in '93 will show up 6,000 lodges and 500,000 members—a half million of knights in this young order inside of thirty-one years!

The members of the Independent Order of Enthusiastic Good Fellows were operating on Mr. Timberwheel a few weeks ago, putting him through the operations supposed to be necessary to convert an ordinary citizen into an Enthusiastic Good Fellow. They were almost through with the initiation when some kind of an explosion in the store over which the hall was situated blew the building into the middle of the street and interfered with the ceremonies.

Ready hands set to work and extricated the people from the debris. Fortunately no one was hurt very much; but after a census had been taken Mr. Timberwheel was found to be missing. A search was instituted and before long he was found in an adjoining yard, where the force of the explosion had landed him. He sat in a lodge room chair, and his eyes were still blindfolded.

"Why on earth didn't you take that thing off your eyes and get out of the chair when the explosion occurred?" asked one of the Enthusiastic Good Fellows.

"Explosion?" echoed Mr. Timberwheel. "Why, I thought that was part of the initiation."—Exchange.

As to the origin of the word "Odd-fellow" the Dominion Odd-fellow states: About 1745 Odd-fellowship, though very crude in form, seems to have been started. The Gentleman's Magazine for 1745 speaks of Odd-fellows' lodges as places where social and recreative evenings were passed. From that date until 1809 but little progress seems to have been made. In that year an unsuccessful attempt was made to resuscitate the order under the name of the "Union Order of Odd-fellows." A convention was held in Manchester in 1813 when they seceded and formed the Independent Order of Odd-fellows, Manchester Unity. The name "Odd-fellow, was adopted at a time when the severance into sects and classes was so wide that persons aiming at social union and mutual help were a marked exception to the general rule, and thus, in forming into lodges for mutual aid, called themselves "Odd-fellows."

SECRET LABOR UNIONS.

A recent editorial in the Voice discusses the labor organizations. While deploring the many abuses to which they have given origin, the writer says: "What then? We can adduce from history in five minutes more damning outrages committed by governments of all kinds than any man can adduce against labor unions in a day; but we do not therefore endorse the program of the anarchist, and call for the downfall of all governments. We can adduce from history more atrocities perpetrated in the name of the churches, and countenanced by them, than anyone can adduce against labor unions; but we do not therefore believe in demolishing the churches and repudiating religion. No more do we believe in declaring war on labor organizations."

Again: "Under the competitive wage system of to-day the only defence the wage-earners have against the steady encroachments of the corporations is in the ballot-box and the labor union. Both these remedies are abused, but both are essential to preserve the rights of men and to ward off dangers infinitely worse."

For once our able contemporary misses the mark. No one objects to labor unions for the consideration and protection of their interests. Such unions, organized on right principles, and conducted by right methods, might be highly advantageous, and in no way detrimental to the interests of either employers or employees. It is not the organizations, nor their professed objects, to which we object, but it is to their methods. It is because of the sworn secrecy, and obedience to which all the members of these unions are subjected, that makes them a constant menace to all the rights of laborers. With this evil element eliminated they might become important adjuncts to civil society. But the plea that because civil and religious organizations have been abused constitutes no reason for destroying them, and that the same argument applies to secret labor unions, is a most fallacious one. Civil and religious institutions are of Divine appointment. Both are in the interests of the entire human family. In both their purposes and their methods they have the sanction of the Christian Scriptures.

This is not true of secret organizations. They have no warrant in the Christian religion. They are based on unscrupulous selfishness and serve to educate men in the most inhuman disregard of the rights of others. Witness the alleged poisoning of the non-union laborers at Homestead. We deeply regret that the able Voice should be lifted up in behalf of a system so utterly opposed to the spirit of Christianity.

THE ANTI-PINKERTON BILL.

The bill introduced in the United States Senate by Mr. Chandler, designed to suppress the Pinkerton Detective organizations, has a far-reaching and entirely erroneous application. It makes it unlawful to organize military companies that are not under the control of the civil (State or municipal) authorities and punishes membership in such companies with fine and imprisonment.

But the Pinkerton Detective force is in no sense a military company. It is purely a police system, rendered necessary by the exigency of the times—

1. Because, in ordinary times, the customary police forces of town and country are extremely limited, even though all-sufficient for the amount of usual service required, and cannot be increased at a moment's notice by the enrollment of competent men—men sufficiently skilled to perform their duty as they should. The Pinkerton force is made up of men and women whose shrewdness and efficiency are equal to any emergency.

2. Because in nine cases out of ten, the police forces of our cities and towns are creatures of political influence, whose abilities count far less in their appointment than their "pulls" upon time-serving and avaricious aldermen and village trustees. And in an equal number of cases the disposition of political leaders to curry favor with organizations of evil character for the sake of securing votes and increasing their influence, makes it all the more difficult to obtain efficient service from their henchmen on the police force. If policemen could be appointed free from these political complications, their services would be infinitely more useful and reliable in any emergency, and the employment of shrewd, active and trustworthy private policemen would be unnecessary.

3. Because the numerous secret labor unions and federations have so outgrown, in numbers, the civil authorities of every city and town as to comprise an unlawful empire, sufficiently strong to dictate rules and regulations for their own government, for the suppression of all who do not fraternize with them, and for the defiance of the Federal laws intended to protect the whole people in their rights and privileges under the national constitution.

4. Because the anti-Pinkerton bill now before Congress has been framed by the dictation of these tyrannical secret labor federations for their own safety and to promote their disposition to aggrandize themselves at the expense of all other people who dare oppose them, whether they be capitalists or skilled artisans who do not belong to the labor unions.

We need go no farther back in the history of these labor unions than to the Homestead riots of 1892. Had it not been for the strong defence made by the Pinkertons on that occasion, holding the desperate union men in check until the arrival of the State troops, no one can tell what destruction of valuable property and more precious lives would have occurred. That event proved, beyond a peradventure, that the Pinkertons saved Homestead from a disaster hardly less to be deplored than that wrought within it by the terrible flood of 1890. As it was, the Pinkerton men were outnumbered and overpowered, so that the State troops were hastened to their support in the interest of law and order.

For these reasons the Pinkerton bill ought not to become a law.

THE CRONIN MURDER REVIVED.

The decision of a majority of the judges of the Illinois State Supreme Court, granting a new trial to the notorious Dan Coughlin, who was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for life, for his participation in the murder of Dr. Patrick H. Cronin by the Clan-na-Gael, revives public interest in that atrocious crime.

Those who remember the trial of O'Sullivan, Burke and Coughlin have not forgotten the difficulties that were placed in the way of the prosecution by that secret order and its attorneys; the trouble of procuring jurors who would be accepted by the defense, and the absence of direct evidence as to the actual perpetrators of the crime. Every stumbling-block that could be devised by the defense was used to thwart the administration of justice; and it was only by the introduction of strong circumstantial testimony that the defendants were adjudged to be guilty. The jury, with one exception, was in favor of hanging the convicted parties, against whom the public had previously rendered its verdict on the strength of the testimony given to the jury.

All three went to the penitentiary to serve out their life-sentences. O'Sullivan and Burke died in prison, while the Supreme Court was considering their claims to a new trial. Coughlin has received the respite which results from the decision in his favor, and is now an inmate of the Cook county jail, awaiting the action of the local tribunal.

What will be the result? Nearly all the prominent witnesses in the first trial have died or removed to other places. There will not be the same difficulty in procuring a jury as before, since new men, who may never have heard of the case, are more easily obtainable than during that exciting period; and we can safely predict that no conviction will follow their consideration, simply because there will not be sufficient evidence to support the prosecution.

Already the evil effects of this supreme decision are felt in Chicago, and will be, eventually, throughout the State and the Union. It was principally based (in substance) upon the testimony that two of the jurors in the former trial had read the newspaper accounts of the murder and had formed an opinion of the guilt of the alleged murders before going upon the jury. It is a satisfaction to know that a minority of the supreme judges demurred to granting a new trial upon such testimony; and now, we are told, it will be difficult to obtain jurors for other cases on trial because they read the papers and have opinions that unfit them for the jury box. The worst of it is that hundreds summoned as jurors will make this their plea to avoid serving on juries.

AUGMENTING THE SPIRIT OF WARFARE.

It is seldom that a purely secular newspaper, like the Chicago News Record, contains so much of important truth in so few sentences as is expressed in the following; which illustrates the fact that preparation for war in time of peace serves to engender an unchristian spirit of warfare:

"Russian officers want war. They have armed and drilled and talked of war until the war spirit is rampant. As to whom they shall fight or what they shall fight about they do not care particularly, so long as they get a chance to fight some one."

"There is a lesson in this, easily applicable to American conditions. A war equipment of men and material develops a war spirit. By the same rule the rapid development of the American navy is not likely to enhance the prospects of peace while insuring the nation against unwarranted attacks."

"With a powerful navy and a standing army, a nation, unless wisely ruled, accepts as provocative of war matters that would otherwise be amicably adjusted without dishonor. Russia's army, for example, is likely to get Russia into a war in order that the army may justify its existence."

In a recent article, the London Spectator said that, even excluding Italy, "the great fighting powers are seeking to secure more than twelve millions of trained men at their disposal whom, so far as finance, supplies, and the number of officers will allow, they can mobilize by decree. . . . If, at the same time, battles were unusually bloody, a whole generation of young men might be swept away in two years. . . . And there is much reason to expect bloodiness as a characteristic of the next campaigns. During the twenty-one years of peace, the improvements of all the three armies in artillery, in rifles, and in skill in using them, have been enormous."

"There is no sign of cessation in this perpetual demand for more men and money. As soon as A has succeeded in getting a numerical superiority, in arms, over B, the latter makes fresh efforts to outstrip A; and so on." So says the Christian Arbitrator.

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals nor forts.

BUILDING CHURCHES AND LODGES TOGETHER.

Rev. William A. Edwards, pastor of a charge at Pine Bluff, Ark., writes from there on the 10th inst. as follows:

"I am having some trouble with the secret lodgemen. We are preparing to build a church for God, and the lodgemen are trying to do away with the church, on my account. They expected to build the church and the lodge together, as they have been doing in this country, thus impeding the progress of the church. A meeting is to be held on the Friday before the second Sunday in February to consider this matter."

In the words of the Christian Conservator, printed in last week's issue: "The Odd-fellows and the Liberals" (lodge-loving United Brethren in Christ—what an unchristian misnomer!) "have gone into partnership and have built a joint church," at Niles, Kans. "One of these—the Odd-fellows—strike Jesus' name from all their prayers and oblige their chaplain to 'use none other than the prescribed forms,' which shuts off Christ completely, debars them from access to God, makes it false worship, which is devil-worship. So that the Liberals have gone into partnership with demon-worship, and the two have built a church to worship together. This is horrible in the sight of God and good men." To which the Cynosure adds: "It is to convince men and women in the Christian churches of the horrible evils that the N. C. A., with the Cynosure, is earnestly laboring and praying."

"A HUMANE CONGRESS OF ALL NATIONS."

Geo. T. Angell, president of the American Humane Education Society, the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and the parent American Band of Mercy, 19 Milk street, Boston, has been writing letters to influential gentlemen in different parts of our country, to urge them to aid in establishing at the exposition "A Humane Congress of all Nations." He also invites the humane of all nations to attend that congress, its object being to discuss and ascertain the best plans of humanely educating all civilized nations, not only for the prevention of national and international wars, and the conflicts between capital and labor, but also for the best prevention of every form of cruelty both to our own and the lower races that depend upon our care.

Such a gathering (forming one of the World's Fair series of international congresses in Chicago, next summer), he believes, if properly directed, may attract the attention of the governments and people of all nations, and result in consequences to the world's progress in civilization as important as the discovery of this Western continent by Columbus four hundred years ago.

Mr. Angell requests all editors in North America, north of Mexico, to give publicity to his views upon this interesting topic.

THE CATHOLICS AND THE SCHOOLS.

The latest phase of the school question in the United States is thus stated in the Catholic Review for January 21:

"The school question will be settled when it is settled right. The Pope will take counsel with all the bishops in the United States, and he himself will probably have the final word. This authoritative statement has been given out: 'The papal delegate, by order of the Pope, has sent out an important notice to the archbishops, to be communicated by them to the bishops of the United States. It is a mandate from the Pope that each bishop shall remit within the month of January, in a sealed letter mailed to the Pope, either directly or through the intermediary of the legate, his personal and conscientious opinion of the propositions on the school question which Archbishop Satolli, in the Pope's name, laid before the New York conference of archbishops in November last.' The bishops are personally acquainted with all the conditions of the problem, and their long years of experience fit them to suggest to the holy father the only safe and true and permanent solution."

How do American Protestants like the idea of having our home educational institutions controlled by the Pope and priesthood of Rome?

THE POISONING AT HOMESTEAD.

In the trials now going on at Homestead, the sworn testimony of at least two witnesses is that the cooks who prepared the food for the non-union workmen were furnished with poison and hired to put it into the food which they prepared. They were told that it would not kill them, but that it would make them sick, and that the same means had been adopted to stop non-union labor in Chicago, with entire success.

It is believed that about 200 were made sick, and that of this number more than thirty have died.

We cannot, of course, anticipate the result of this trial. The presumption in law is, that the accused persons are innocent until they are proved guilty. But we can and ought to form a judgment as to the nature of those institutions that incite men to this kind of crimes. It is not simply the men, but the system of secret trades-unions that is on trial. The crime charged is the most atrocious on record. The Molly Maguires killed men; so did the Clan-na-Gael and the Mafia; but in none of these was the crime so unprovoked, so wicked, and so desperately mean, as this putting poison into the coffee and soup of innocent workmen.

By-and-by the people, including the laborers who have been drawn into these unions, will wake up to the fact that we are nurturing in our midst a great number of murder societies, not all of which are just now killing innocent people, but all are liable to be so engaged.

—A correspondent desires to learn whether Dr. Chas. Briggs, of Union Theological Seminary, whose recent trial for heresy resulted in his acquittal, is a Freemason. Can any of our readers inform us?

—Evanston, Ill., has recently furnished another religious excitement, the end of which is in doubt. The superintendent of a local Sunday-school gave a dancing party for young people, which rightly gave offence to a large number of esteemed citizens. Among those in attendance at the party were a number of the professors in the Northwestern University, and now the managers of that institution, it is reported, are trying to find out what they ought to do about it.

—The remains of Miss Mary Allen West, of the Union Signal, and the faithful temperance missionary, who died in India, have been brought to her native land for burial. Her funeral was held at Galesburg, Ill., from the church which she formerly attended while studying at Knox College, and she rests from her labors in the cemetery at that place. The Union Signal, this week, issues an impressive number as a memorial of her active and brilliant career in temperance work.

—Corresponding Secretary Rev. Henry L. Kellogg, last week and this, has been laboring among the churches in Central Illinois, visiting Princeton, Viola, Smithville and Peoria. The work of enlisting the churches in the anti-secrecy work, leading pastors and people to see the perfect inharmoniousness that exists between Masonic and Odd-fellow religion and Christianity, is meeting with fair success, encouraging a hope that ere long all orthodox denominations will eschew any alliance with the lodge.

—An item appeared in the Cynosure for December 22 ult. (page 9, second column), referring to a sermon by Bishop Newman at the last M. E. North Ohio Conference, in the course of which he was said to have given certain Masonic signs. This incident is denied by the pastor of the church in which the conference was held, who is not a Mason, and who says that he sat within a few feet of the speaker and saw nothing of the kind. Either our informant was mistaken, or the pastor doesn't know a Masonic sign when he sees it.

—Chicago people were treated, in the Rand McNally building, 105 Quincy street, to the words and music of a concert in New York City, last Friday evening. The sounds, vocal and instrumental, were transmitted over the long-distance telephone line between the two cities very distinctly and greatly enjoyed by the select party gathered at this end of the wire. Then a cornet solo, played here, was as distinctly heard in the New York concert room. The distance traversed by the sound is about 950 miles. It was a remarkable triumph of the science of acoustics.

—"I have been a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church for fifteen years, and I have yet to know of Freemasonry or any other secret order exercising any injurious or unrighteous influence within the church. I am not a member of any secret order."

So writes the pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church at Elyria, Ohio, to the editor of the Cynosure. The brother's experience indicates that he, "a cowan," cannot know what subtle and hidden influences Freemasonry is exercising in his own church, right before his eyes; but the subtle and secret supremacy may still exist, notwithstanding. We have sent him some tracts that will enable him to understand the falsity of his position in relation to the evils which he may be fostering unawares.

—Side by side with interesting personal items from Oberlin College (Oberlin, Ohio), in the local News of that city, are extended reports of elections and other doings in the Oberlin lodges of Freemasons, Royal Arcanum, Knights of Honor, Grand Army of the Republic, Daughters of Rebekah, Odd-fellows and Foresters. It looks as if the lodges were encroaching upon the domain of the venerable institution over which Chas. G. Finney and Pres. Mahan so piously presided. In the days when the voice of the former was lifted up in power against all social sins, including the evils of oath-bound institutions, Oberlin was the bright and shining light to which Christian men and women turned with delight for strength and encouragement. May it be long ere it loses the prestige it then gained and become a nesting-place for only bats and owls.

treated your agent very kindly, while he informed him that he is a peacemaker and has never felt called upon to speak against Masonry, while conceding that others may be called upon to do so.

No doubt there are some honest Christians in his church who would hate Masonry if they knew what Xenia Seminary so well knows about it. In short, Bible truth about Masonry in that church would operate as a sort of dynamite, and nothing but the separation commanded in the Bible could restore peace.

We are reminded of what the young lady said concerning her pastor who was a Freemason: "I don't care what becomes of his soul; he is a good friend to me."

I next visited Pastor Millard, of the Bethany Congregational church. He does not antagonize the lodges except as they are rivals of the churches. He cannot, however, consent to an exposition of Masonry in his church. He regards Masons as that they may be good Christians. He would not belong to any secret society himself; and by exalting the church he hopes to make the Masons and Odd-fellows see that the church is so much better than the lodges, and thus save the church from being devoured by the lodge snakes.
